America's slow pace

Coming to America, a film now playing at the Roxy, is all about Prince Akeem's adventures in the U.S.A.

His Highness wakes up one morning to find himself 21-years-old. His father, the king, has arranged a marriage for him, but the prince is less than thrilled. It seems he wants a girl with a mind of her own, as opposed to an obedient slave.

So Prince Eddy Murphy decides the best place to find an opinionated woman would be New York City: and where else would a future king look but in Queens, of course.

The prince and his manservant move into a cold water flat with hot and cold running rats. They both get jobs at the local McDonald's restaurant as hamburger jockies and this provides plenty of humor: if the producers had wanted to really get cute, the location could have been shifted to the local Burger King instead, thus amplifying the royalty joke even more. But the owner of this McDonalds does have a beautiful daughter who Prince Akeem can fall in love with.

The rest of the movie follows the quaint premise of the prince and the girl falling in love. If the movie and its theme sound familiar, that's because they are: it's been done before with variations, most notably in Princess O'Rourke (Warner Bros., 1943) which starred Robert Cummings and Olivia d'Havilland. It wasn't a side-splitting movie, but the script won an Oscar and it definitely had its moments.

Coming to America tends to suffer from slow pacing. Murphy pulls three of his comedy characters out of the closet and plays these with good results. He should have toned down the language (as always) to a achieve a G rating and larger audience.

Rating: **

Some offensive language.
