Poetry.

THE BASHFUL MAN. Take notice, all you handsome belles, And all you graceful beaux That though you say I'm bashful grown I'm going to propose,

There's Susy Jane, with her neat form, Blue eyes, unequalled nose, Hae fairly taken me by storm-Why should I not propose ?

Now Sue's not proud, and I am sure She loves me; goodness knows I am a little backward, but I'm bound I will propose,

I've known her long-been for two years One of her standing beaux ; But though she's smiled upon my suit, I never could propose. I tried to once ; I beside her sat,

Her little hand in mine, "Dear Sue," I cried; "well, what,' said she "I-a-think the day is fine !"

If Sue had married long ere this She would have served me right; But, noble girl, she's true to me-

I will propose to-night. This longing after beauty, This sighing after curls, This chasing after fashion,

Wherever fashion whirls And all that sort of thing-

May do for those who like them, For those devoid of taste ; For these who barter diamonds off For diamonds made of pasto-And other blockheads,

But to a wife that truly loves, Who'd be what she appears Who'd spread sanshine around the chap

That keeps away her tears-And brings her taters home. Wo'd whisper softly in her ear. Wo'd grave it on her heart.

That knowing well to fry a steak Beats sen ent and art-"A darn'd sight !"
