Poetry. ECHOES.

Listen to the old tree creaking To the wind's tale of woe; Hear its sapless branches speaking Dismal tales of long ago.

Death is only reproduction; Transient, as when ripples creep O'er the sea, while fell destruction And attendant tempests sleep.

Literature. Writ ten for the York Herald LOST AND FOUND.

Charles upon his return home, entered college, and from his first class abilities soon became one of the leading scholars.

During these years Clara lived at the old spot. As she had attained an age which demands a profitable use of time, many of her former habits were given up, and her time was taken up in going to School.

Her father wished to give her a good sound education; but his motto was 'Practical before superficial,' some little idea may be given of his views from the following illustration:—

One day when Clara came from school, she ran up to him and said, 'Pa, our teacher says I ought to get a French grammar, and begin to study French, as several of the other girls are going to do.'

That is all bosh Jackson. All people have capacity, and education will bring it out; and I believe it to be an injustice to any child to deprive it of such.

It is now time to bring our hero and heroine once more together, and such will be the subject of our next chapter.

STRANGE WAGERS. The diligence stopped at White Horse Inn, in the principle street of Fontainebleau.

On another occasion, when standing on the street talking to a friend, a labouring man came long, dress od in blue over-alls, an old gray coat with a strap round the waist to keep it in place. He had an axe on his shoulder on which his dinner was swung.

There my friend, said Mr. Jackson, is a specimen of a happy man; one who is willing to do his duty in that position it has pleased God to place him.

Why Jackson! I thought you were a patron of education? So I am, but not such as is given to the majority of our youth's at the present day.

I don't say whether I believe in it or not; but I think that was a good idea when he said, 'If you have a child to educate, first try and learn that child's capacity, then feed that capacity with that for which it is best adapted.'

I could mention others, but it is unnecessary. These men had the advantage of education; and no doubt thousands of others who have passed the stage of action unknown, unwept, and unsung.

Those men it is true had the advantage of education, but besides that they were men of genius. Thousands, yea, millions without it, who with the advantage of a much better education than they, have lived and passed off the stage of action unknown to the world.

Jack, I don't like that phrase, 'willing to do our duty in that state of life which it has pleased God to call us.'

Here the conversation was broken off; but this is sufficient to show Mr. Jackson's idea of what education should be, and it is likely that one who received education under such a one, that it would be built on a sound foundation.

She was now no longer the little girl running over her native hills gathering flowers, but on the verge of womanhood, with all the manners and attractions of that age, which made her the centre of attraction.

It is now time to bring our hero and heroine once more together, and such will be the subject of our next chapter.

favoured us the whole length of the journey with the history of his good speculations at Fontainebleau, and of his marriage, which he was at the present time coming there to solemnise, drew out his watch, and exclaimed, 'Already four o'clock!'

'Tis one of Breguet's watches, proudly answered the rubicund-faced little man at this interruption.

My fellow traveller, confounded at this persecution, raised his hand, and pointed to his forehead, signifying that the intruder was deranged.

As to that, I wager you do not, said the obstinate intruder. Moreover, I will bet that I make you take the route back again to Paris, and that, top, without much delay.

One hundred louis that you do not! said the other. Sir, you are an impertinent scoundrel! exclaimed the traveller, and I will box your ears.

to have been thought of. In a few cases, persons, whom we should regard as prisoners of war, experienced some severities, but only when they were viewed by the Persians, not as fair as enemies, but as rebels.

EARL RUSSELL ON THE IRISH QUESTION.—In the pamphlet by Earl Russell just published, on the Irish Question, he refers to Mr. Gladstone as the statesman best qualified for the great task of pacifying Ireland.
