FRUIT TREES IN SEPTEMBER

The thousand blossoms on the tree Have perished from the sight,
Except a small variety,
And they have changed their plight.
Unsightly pulps they now appear,

Beneath the leafy lair,
Yet, changing with the atmosphere,
The Autumu's fruit is there.

The downy peaches, glossy plums,
The apple's ruddy streak,
Which, quaff'd as wholesome cider, comes

In roses on the cheek, Yet oft the fructifiying moon, And oft the sun's caress,

And chilly morn, and heated noon, Prepared their ripefulness.

Ah, how like Man! What blossoms fall In infant charms to death; And change is ever over all That draws extended breath.

Like bud and blossom, youth and age, Matured by changeful times, A better quality engage For more congenial climes.
