The St. Lawrence.

[Prize poem read at the University Colge, Toronto, on Friday the 13th incl.] Where, unto the world of waters, Old S' Lawrence rolls his flood, From those lakes, proud Ocean's daughters

Skirted by Canadian wood. Fed by many a distant fountain, On, through fields of waving grain, Past Cape Dismond's rocky mountain, Pouring onward to the main.

Britons there, in battles' glory, And in nobler peaceful art. To the tide of Albion's glory Proud have been by add their part: Proud to wreath the red cross banner With our maple chaplets green,

Joining ocean, rolls between. Noble river! bear thy burdens, Bear them proudly to the sea! Loyalty's and labor's guerdons Are the freight embarked on thee. Bear the islands of the raftamen,

While Britannia's field of honor,

They shall into navies rise. Bear the West land's harvests golden; Bear the North land's furry spoil; Bring back, from the East land olden Wealth to cheer, and hands to toil.

With their forest conquered prize;

Soon, by hands of cunning craftsmen

Bi d our Provinces together With indiss dub . chaia; Bind them firmly to each other And the Empire of the .uia. Lovely art thou in thy childhood, As thou sportest, robed in smiles, 'Mongst the floeers, and rocks, and wild wood Of the beauteous Thousand Isles. Noble art thou, dashing leaping, In the pride of youthful micht, Down the foaming rapids sweeping, Swift as an arrow in its flight. And a calm majestic river

Art, though rolling in thy prime; Like to thought, that flows forever, Fast, resistless and sublime. Countiess are the generations, Thou hest marked upon thy sands;

We a c youngest of the nations, And oldest of the lands.

Forest lords of other days.

Thou and Time, with tresses hoary, Ages have together rolled; Thou cou dst tell to us a story Such as volumes have not told. Tell us of the vanished races,

With their dim and dusky faces Peering through the fields of maize: How the Nodowa, so noiseless, Like a *erpent, near three crept, Made the Huron's brantet voiceless, Broke his hatchet while he slept How Jacq ses Cartier from St. Malo,

Round his cross and fleur de lis: How the people brought their ailing For the pale faced chief to save, And, the prayer of faith availing, Blessed the healing that he gave How the sailors, in amazement,

Came across the distant sea; And there shone a sacrad halo

Saw, and named Quebec afar; Oft hath, since, its rocky basement Rolled aback the tide of war! How a people, brave and loyal, Built their white faced homes by thee, E'en to where the Mountain Royal

Towered above the Ville Marie: Tell of Montcalm bravely fighting, Dying bravely, but in vain; And the smile of triumph lighting Wolfe's last gaze on Abraham's plain Bravely, by thy eilent river, Climbed the hardy, highland men-Well I wean that foemen never Shall ascend those heights again! Ah! methought thee half a traitor, Favoring their silent oars-Or didst thou forsee a greater Empire rising on thy shores?

Was thy freedom for another And a greater destiny? Did it need a foster-mother Better far than France could be. Tell us how thy children bore them; One to three, they scorned to yield, When they drove the for before them,

How the slave looked Northward to thee, Never bondman breathed by thee, How, escaped, his glad eye knew thee As the river of the free. Aye, we love thee, noble river! Love thee with a jealous love; Thou art ours, and ours for ever,

As on Crystler's bloody field:

E'en though death our title prove! Welcome kindly every stranger, If 'tis peace his white sails bear; But let him that threatens danger Of thy sturdy sons beware.

Till they "if thy banks with song; Gliding o'er thy summer waters, Or thy trozen bleast along! Send the husbandman his guerdons, In the fields of gorden grain! Send thee ever costly burdens, As thou rollest to the main!

JOHN I. STUART.

Heaven bless thy sons and daughters.

This morning, however, in spite of a very chilly atmosphere, the village was early thronged with visitors, and about nine o'clock the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway arrived with an extra car attached to the usual train in which the passengers were packed like herring. The rural districts too must have been deserted almost totally if the crowd which made their way into the village is any criterion from which to judge in the prize at Kingston in preference to the matter. The stream of visitors kept pouring in until about eleven o'clock when the clouds had cleared away, and the sky was perfectly cloudless, which with a warm sun, rendered the day all that could be desired, to the great satisfaction of the managers of the show. The usual number of vendors of quack medicines and lottery men were on hand. ambitious to get an early start at their day's work so as to rear a rich harvest from those who had more money than wit.
