The gentlemen practitioners were naturally very irate at the less of their practice, and brought an accusation against their rival for leading people astray. Failing in their first attempt, they prosecuted her for breach of the law forbiding women to practice physic. and for encroaching upon their preregatives. It was simply impossible for her to maintain her ground under such a charge, and there was every reason to expect a verdict against her. But help was at hand: for the ladies, especially the chief matrons of Athens, came into open court, and avowed before the judges of Arcopagus that " they were not husbands, but enemies, who were about to condemn the person to whom they (the matrons) were indebted for their lives."
