Dr. Clarke, his former Pastor. showing the irreproachable character which he bore when in his parish in New Jersey, and asked him (the Canon) to send it to the Globe with an introductory letter asking them in all fairness to publish it He supposed Mr. Dodge to be merely joking, and passed it off in that way. Then Mr. Dodge insisted that he could obtain Dr. Clarke's consent by telegraph, to use his name in unection with this letter. He then told Mr. Dodge that if he succeeded in obtaining Mr. Clarke's consent he would write the introductory letter. He, however, consid ered the conversation to be merely a joke, and treated it as such. He never received that letter from Dr. Clarke, nor knew any-thing about it until after the election, and was in the Royal Hotel on Friday night previous to the election, when Mr. Ramsay vious to the election, when all the while, came in, and after conversing a luttle while, picked up one of these fly sheets which were lying on the table, and said, 'Dou't you lying on the table, and said of the table, and you have a large sum for furnishing small house. There were £1.200 worth of clocks, and 750 guineas for a piano. Ever a great deal of good?"

This statement was corroborated by Mr. McClintock, who was also in the room at the time.

Mr. Ramsav denied the statement, saying it was perfectly false, and that these gentlemust be mistaken

Mr. McCarthy said he appeared on Mr. Dodge's behalf, but that he did not desire to take any unfair advantage of Mr. Ramsay, and as this trial was not brought on at their instance he would not cross examine any of the witnesses unless they desired he s' ould. The Archdeacon said they desired simply to elicit the truth of these charges, and therefore he wished Mr. McCarthy to cross examine, so that they might have all the evidence they possibly could secure.

Canon Ramsay cross-examined by Mr McCarthy:--I knew nothing about this matter until the Sunday evening previous to the nomination; I left home on Monday to the nomination is the the weak agent for the purchase evening for Orillia; came back or.
