' H'm!" said Miss Theodosia. was not much to say, but like a little, nut with a big knernel, there was a good deal of pith in it.

"Oh! yes," answered Ethel, turaing her face again to the window, as Dr. Wheeler still looked at her for areply.

Now the fact was, that however it may have been with Ethel, her Aunt Theodosia was beginning to find the doctor's young man alto-gether to attentive, considering he was only a doctor's young man. His constant vists she agreed, though resontfully, to consider a necessary evil, for it was no doubt too much to expect of a busy physieian that he should not make use of his assistant in a case where the latter's service were as efficient as his own, and for attendance at a house so far out of his ordinary village circuit. She would have accepted the situation with only a moderate grumble, had the assistant but been of a ripe and respectable age, instead of which he was only a young man, and, worse still, a young man, as Miss Theodosia could now see for her self, of no common attractions, whether of person or manner. Properly attentive! yes, there was no denying that he was attentive enough. The necessity of provading the whole house from garret to cellar naturally interfered with Miss 'theodosia's constant presence during his visits, but more than once, designedly making a sudden entrance, she had found the young man reading aloud, or talking animatedly, and Ethel listening, even self in conversation with a stranger, unheard of, incredible, wholly misher eyes well open, and let the mouse out further roundabout measures. play till the cat could put her paw on it conveniently and to a certainty.

Meantime the visits were going on, and, as she had fancied, by imperceptible degrees lengthening always. And Ethel looked forward to them with a pleasure unaccountable to herself! Here was positively an interest in the world! She had never before seen any one in the things: you must see that for yourleast like Mr. Lane, nor heard any one talk as he talked. She was amused, excited, strengthened listening to him. What was the charm exactly? She could hardly have said whether it lay in look, tone, or words. The doctor chuckling at times in a hard-hearted and unatural manner over a bad case of measles, could perhaps have enlightened her, so possibly could the doctor's assistant, but the one was not at hand, and the other not ready to speak, and Ethel know only that now she was never sorry to be wakened out of her dreams to a life even pleasanter than

Dr. Wheeler's hint of a little daily exercise had been acted on, and in this beautiful spring weather, Ethel, duly wrapped up, was to be found soated in a sheltered spot or walking up and down between the blossoms that nodded their heads curious over the borders of the garden walks, already under the care of the doctor's position. The care of the doctor's position are the borders of the garden walks, already under the care of the doctor's position. The care of the doctor's position are position. II One morning, her shawl folded lightly about her, Ethel sat on a seat under the three chest-nut-trees that of shade. No midsummer morning Ned!" this: the sparkling air was all aquiver. A soft breeze shook the edor from the flowers and the shadows from the ground, shook Ethel's long hair in loosened locks over her shoulders, and perhaps now and then the whole verdurous mass afloat, astir, every leaf tremuously feeling out as if for the new world into which it was just created. And to Ethel it was verily as a new world. How many springs had she looked on this same earth and sky and bloom, yet never beheld it like this! Had she been blind all these years, or had the old accustomed picture suddenly taken a meaning, that it glowed out before her now in characters not less beautiful than strange? For the first time since she could remember, the glory, the boundless blessedness of life was revealed to her. She fixed upon her.
