uses. It equal facility, but like any other organ if used almost exclusively in one direc tion, it loses its range of ability. Hence, if kept too constantly on the printed page, the range of vision is im-paired, and it may become near-sighted by much reading of fine print.

We have long known that the eye is often injured by looking at the sun, in case of an eclipse, without the aid of smoked glass, the perceptive power being impaired by excess of light and heat. It is also often injured by looking at small objects with too little light, as, for instance, reading fine print by moonlight. But we are yet to fully realize how often the eyes are injured by strong gas-light. It is often too intense, and has a flicker which is particularly trying without a shade .--Those accustomed to gas or kerosene, find it difficult to see by candles or any light less brilliant. But those who have habitually used candles, can not only see well with less light, but their eyes last longer without the aid of glasses than those who have rejoiced in the flood of light which the gas-burner emits.

When the optic uerve has become super-sensitive to light, a good candle is a great relief. Of course, it will not make the room bright as gas or kerosene, but will furnish light enough for reading, and the soft light will be much less trying to the eye.

Twilight is very grateful to the eye if we rest in it, but very trying if we read or sew in the transition stage from day to night, or night to day. The use a man called out to Red Shirt that he of artificial light at early morning is very bad for the eyes, much more so than at evening. To go from sound sleep and deep darkness into the light of gas, especially for study or plano practice, is very injurious.

Within a few weeks several young ladies have consulted me in regard to their eyes, where they have been seriously and permanently injured by piano-practice at early morning in the gas-light. As the music cannot be changed to suit the exact focus of the eye, it is the more likely to become injured in this way, than in most other wavs.

The study of any foreign language is much more trying to the eye than the reading of one's own. The words lack the familiar look, and hence they are not so easily recognized. The searchalphabet be dissimilar to ours it is still him quiet, caused his death in a few more trying. Hence, these who have hours.
