Bonud my heart, dear Edith Bell,
Ead, sweet momories cluster fast;
Charming me, in fancie's spell,
Bringing back the sunny pret.
E're we trod earth's thorny ways,
E'er life's shadews on us fell.
Childhood's carcless, cloudless days,

Fair and fleeting, Edith Bell Of the Summers. Edith Bell,
When we wandered by the sea.
Building castles, shell on shell.
Launehed our tiny hark with glee,
Ruamed by hazle-skirted streams,
Gathered berries in the dell;
One long feast of golden dreams,
Seemed our life, then, Edith Bell,

Time speed onward, Edith Bell, Ne'er, to us seemed dark or drear, And we loved, when twilight fell, Grandma's wonderous tales to hear:

Of grim ghosts, or fairies bright,
Browne's help, or witches spell,
Wailing banshee, evil sprite,
Never doubting, Edith Bell. Time sped onward, Rdith Bell.
Brought me sorrow, toil and car.
But no shadow seemed to dwell.
On your life, 'twas glad and fair.
As the future we had planned
'Mid the gowans in the dell,
Where we sat hand clasped in hand.
'Twas our Eden, Edith Bell.

Dost remember, Edith Bell, When the last time there we met When the last time to rewe mes Could we e'er such love foretell!
Can we e'er such grief forget!
Still your words ring out to me,
Softer, than were thy death kne!
Last Clide, not Edith Bell. 1, 1

Love was conquered. Edith Bell,
By ambition, and the fear
Of a father's curse. Too well
Had I loved, and still more dear
Than my life art thou to me;
Weary years, or death; can quelt
Love's are kindled but by thee,
In my heart, dear Edith Bell.

Bnow-white now, sweet Edith Bell.

Say they, is thy raven hair;
Lines of care and sorrow dwell.

On the brow, lang-syne so fair;
But no change my heart can see,
So I heed not what they tell;
Thou art ever young to me,
Ever honnie, Edith Bell.

Ever honnie, Edith Bell.

FLED. My Lady returned to the Abbev at the anal function hour, and partook of that meal (if s't(ing at the table can be called so doing) with the res. of the other state Mary For-

There was no likelihood of Derrick's comalready by the same main that had brought old Jacob's letter; but there was just a posibility of this. However, he did not come. The unfrequented road, which on the mor row would be througed with the vehicles of For would be througed with the ventiles of Sir Richard's guests, had not a single pastenger. It is one of the we ways I have another in point of distance, although not of time, because of the winding till; but Dervice, when the shorter in point of distance, although not of time, because of the winding till; but Dervice, when the limit is the property of the winding till; but Dervice, and the limit is the property of the winding till; but Dervice, and the limit is the property of the winding till; but Dervice, and the limit is the property of the winding till; but Dervice, and the property of the winding till th rick, coming from the direction of Coveton (not by the Discouth line, but another railway) could appear to Mak by no other route. Immediately Aerlancheon, the carriage drew up at the door. My Lady cast a wistful lock at her three children. She would have given a thousand pounds to have thrown her are a around their necks, and wept her fill : but such an indulgence might have cost them and her then that, or anything which pey and estimate. What if her strength an opey tal her-if she should "break nod and smire.

The whole party at out to the front door to see her off. The two young ladies standing on the hall stees with their arms ne another's waist(althoug', I much doubt if they had grown to be the friends that they once were); Master Waiter ki-sing his white hand to her with all the grace and fondness of a lovery Sir Richard handing her into the carriage with stately but affectionate courtesy. "The lower roadto Lever's the watchmaker's in High Street," said he to the coachman, "and don't spare the horses." Then the carriage drove away. The carriage did return ; but it did not contain my Lady. It only brought back a letter from her, which the footman was instruced to place as once in the hands of her elder son. The man, however, had some difficulty in finding Sir Hichard, who was superintending some finishing touches that were being given to the marquee—the arrangement of certain flags over the place he was to occupy on the morrow. Sir Rickard tone open the note, fearing he knew not wint; then uttered a tremendous onth. His people stared, for unlike some "young masters," the baronet scarcely ever misbehaved himself in that way. "Where did you leave my Lady, sirrah?" inquired he roughly of the footman.

"At the railway station, Sir Richard. Her Ladyship took the train for town." "Where is Miss Letty? Walter-Walter," cried the baronet, "come here."

"Hollo, what is it?" answered the cap-tain, a little sulkily, for he was engaged in setting up an emblem composed of various weapons of war at the other end of the marquee; and pretty Polly, the patche per's daughter, was handing him the cain highly-polished swords, and he was playfully accusing her a using them in transit as mirrors. "Yo haven't found out a mistake in the almanac, and that you come of age the d y before yesterday, have you?"

"Worse than that," returned poor Sir Richard simply. "Read that, man. What, in heaven's name, are we to do now."

" Let us go in and see Letty," said Walter gravely, after he had read the note.
Perhaps on knows something about it; and if not you may take your oath that Mary Fo est does,"

They were walking on the lawn, and had now arrived at one of the open windows of the great ball-room. Mrs Walter, Letty, and Arthur Haldane were all yery busy here but the last two not so entirely occupied with the work in hand as to be unaware of one another's presence. At another time, Sir Richard would have been annoyed at seeing them so close together, and obviously so well pleased with the propinquity, but now he was really glad to meet with the young barrister, for whose judgment he

"Letty-Arthur." cried he, "read this. Do either of you know, can either of you guess, what on earth it means?"

"Mamma not to be here to:morrow!" jaculated the former, when she had read the note. "I can scarcely believe my own ayes." But at the same time there capie nto her mind that vague but saddening talk which her mother had held with her but lately when my Lady bad said her maiady was not one the doctors could cure. Atthur read the note twice over not so much to master its contents, perhaps, as to frame his own reply to what had been sked of him.

"I certainly do not know," said he, "what can have taken your dear mother at such a time as this. We may be sure, how: ever, it is no more freak of fancy, but that t is done for what she believes to be your
