The New Cabinet.

Some of our Grit contemporaries are trying hard to draw a comparison favorable to their side between the Reform and Conservative Cabinets. Well, if they find the task an easy and pleasant one, they have our best and most sincere desires to keep at it; anything that emanates from such sheets could not possibly detract from the standing of the gentlemen who have recently been called upon to administer the affairs of our country. As well might they try to successfully bombard Gibraltar with boiled peas as to endeavor to show that Sir John and his Ministers would suffer by being compared with Mackenzie and his friends. They hold Mackenzie up to the people of Canada as an honest, conscientious statesman, and then turn the other side of the shield, where they picture Sir John as steeped to the lifs in iniquity, and not worthy of the high position he now fills. Canada is eminently a free country,- free in every sense of the word but there are some mi-erable, misguided creatures, who not knowing low to properly enjoy their glorious privileges, take advantage of this freedom to hurl their calumny and foul vituperation at the men who occupy the highest and most honorable rosition in the power of the people to bestow. Horne looke, when asked by a foreigner, "how much treason an Englishman could write without being hanged?" replied, " I do not know, but I am trying to find out." Like Tooke, there are some editors who do not know how much abuse and how many falsehoods they can publish without being held to account by the law, but this is are doing their best to find out.

not their fault, as they have done and The mental powers and statesmanlike abilities of the members composing the late and present Cabinets are so differently formed; have been employed under such diversified circumstances; and are of a calibre so entirely unlike as to hardly admit of a fair comparison. We like to do justice at all times, and to all parties and men; therefore we really think that although our opponents have thrown down this gauntlet, it would scarcely be just and fair to draw, or attempt to draw any comparison between the two Cabinets. Let us illustrate this by one or two instances. Blake is, or was at least, considered to be the ablest man in the Reform ranks. Just contrast his actions and present position with that of Sir John, Blake was the only man in the House who was brave enough to seek to measure swords with Sir John on several occasions. He certainly possesses talent, but it is of a very strange nature. His mind is not evenly balanced, and therefore he is led away to spin out orations and advance theories of no practical benefit. At the commencement of his political career a glorious future seemed in store for him, -vet where are those who do him honor, now? Defeated in his own constituency .- and that, too, by a man far beneath him in intellectual greatness,he has dropped out of the politi al arena as completely as though he had merely paused there for a few short days on his journey through life! His own friends now admit that he has rather been a drag on the party, then any assistance: Did anything of a nature calculated to weaken the Government transpire, where was Blake to defend it ? Sick ! Indisposed! Even when he was forced out by the exigencies of the party, how did he undertake to vindicate his friends? By simply refusing to attempt it! He thought that if he unheld his own character that was all that was required. The country, however, did not think so. In Parliament we find him silently condemning the actions of his Chief. The most zealous admirer will now admit that Mackenzie is a Miss I better man to have at the head of the Mr Jon Norglo, party [So at least possesses a little Mr Jon Medight, party. He, at least, possesses a little stab lity of character, and does not turn and twist like a weather cock. It is
