

fully damaged, and he begged me to give you his good wishes Clara, and excuse him for not coming to shake hands. As we look so rowdy we'll go to Hamilton with Mulrooney and see him on the look-out.

Mr. Martineau, who had come to show the elder Feversham the way, returned with them, and so did two other young fellows, who were not in love with the bridesmaids or any other lady present, and thought it would be better for them to keep the peace.

Mr. Martineau, who had come to show the elder Feversham the way, returned with them, and so did two other young fellows, who were not in love with the bridesmaids or any other lady present, and thought it would be better for them to keep the peace.

This speech through a momentary spurt of ill-temper and disappointment, half jest, half earnest, was an unfortunate one, and had an unhappy effect upon his hearers, none of whom knew Mr. Feversham more than a year, but were perfectly aware that the speaker had known him from a baby.

"I thank you," he said, "for my wife and myself. Your speech awakens me to the old fable of the fox and the grapes. I prize it like mine, worth living and dying for, whether it's a rich spinster or a beautiful lady, without incurring sorrow."

The poor victim thus pitched upon a lad of seventeen was quite unequal to the occasion: he blushed violently and wished in his heart that the thunder storm would come on again or that the earth would open and swallow him up, but no such blessed catastrophe happening, after fidgeting in his chair for a few minutes, and drawing all eyes upon him, he at last said with a grimace and a gasp:

"Feelings too deep for words," said the elder Feversham cynically, at which every body laughed, and poor Mr. Darlington blushed a deeper crimson, and seemed on the eve of an apoplectic fit. After this there were no more speeches, but to Clara the breakfast seemed interminably long. Her aunt sat opposite to her and frowned upon her, and lingered over the meal with a slow enjoyment it was terrible to see; for though she hated the idea of an apoplectic fit, after this there were no more speeches, but to Clara the breakfast seemed interminably long.

"Very appropriate," said Mr. Feversham, with an odd laugh, as Clara appeared in her traveling dress, but all the ready care of her monies were not yet over, for it is the custom in Upper Canada to throw a stinging shower of rice into the very face of bride and bridegroom for luck, as they are driving away.

"Aw—and what text was that?" said the stars in their courses fought against Sidera.

It has been my happy fate as an author to receive a great deal of private criticism and advice in all my literary undertakings, and all my critics agree that a love story ought to end when the hero and heroine are fairly married.

"Marriage," says one, "is life's summum bonum; it is the chief end and aim of woman, and the most important episode in the history of a man. Here the scene should end, and the curtain drop; to carry the story farther would be simply a barbarism, opposed to all literary laws."

A FAIR BARBARIAN.

By Francis Hodgson Burnett.

Slowbridge had been shaken to its foundations. It may as well be explained, however, at the outset, that it would not take much of a sensation to give Slowbridge a great shock.

In the first place, Slowbridge was not used to sensations, and was used to going on the even and respectable tenor of its way, regarding the outside world with private diaphragms.

"P. S.—Please show this letter to Mr. Jack, as I cannot write to him till next week. C. F. A. F.," said Briggs, as he handed the letter.

Mr. Feversham was not in a good humor when he saw the letter, and he was not in a good humor when he saw the letter, and he was not in a good humor when he saw the letter.

"Mother," said Sally, her arms a-kimbo and her broad face blazing with indignation, "I'm not in a hurry, and I'm not in a hurry, and I'm not in a hurry."

"What a queer, nice little place," she said, looking at the view of the city, and she was not in a hurry, and she was not in a hurry, and she was not in a hurry.

It was Miss Belinda Bassett who received the first shock. Miss Belinda Bassett was a decorous little maiden lady on High street, and she was not in a hurry, and she was not in a hurry, and she was not in a hurry.

My dear Elizabeth!—It is a sad duty that devolves on me, and you must prepare yourself to hear the very worst. The jackal is actually married, and a more foolish ridiculous match was never made by one of the beast monarchs since the world began.
