MELICENT: The Mystery of the Veiled Picture.

A NOVEL—BY FAYE MADOC. CHAPTER X.

All through the short summer night Melicent slept fitfully, and at an early hour she finally awoke. She tossed for a while upon her uneasy pillow.

With this letter Melicent was amply dissatisfied. In the light she seemed to look in another too kind. Yet, after sitting before her desk for a couple of hours, and making several attempts to express herself more concisely, she could find no mode of communication which displeased her less.

For some time after the eventual week which had terminated in the death of Clinton the friendly intercourse that had prevailed between Delymère and the Retreat slackened, and degenerated into mere formalities.

CHAPTER XI.

For some time after the eventual week which had terminated in the death of Clinton the friendly intercourse that had prevailed between Delymère and the Retreat slackened, and degenerated into mere formalities.

"Whom did you find drowned, John?" she inquired. "His honor, Sir Oliver, miss," said John. "Step in, miss, if you please."

"Do you mean," said Melicent, finding voice at last, "that Sir Oliver Clinton has been drowned?" "Surely, miss," returned the woman. "My man found him with his poor feet all loosed together as tight as tight, and he's just a-lying in there till they can get him up to Belmont."

Melicent closed the door, and advanced towards the bed. It was covered with a white sheet, and beneath lay a motionless form. She paused for a moment. Then she drew the covering from the face of the dead man. It was the most solemn moment she had ever experienced. She was unable to think, her powers seemed benumbed as she stood looking at the man whose living and responsive life she had kissed but a few hours since.

plays upon the countenances of the dead, as if they, having learned all the unguessed secrets man pines to know, were diverted to trace the herring-doubt and weary speculations on the faces of the living.

"You should not have let her go in," Mrs. Cambridge was saying loudly. "She may have fainted."

"What are you crying for?" she said. "Melicent rose from the ground. 'I have been very much shocked,' she said, with simple dignity. 'I have lost a great friend.'"

"I am very sorry," she said. "I am much obliged to you for your sympathy," said Mrs. Cambridge, with a bitter laugh. "He is dead, you say?"

"Yes, he was my husband—he, Sir Oliver Clinton." She swooned away, and when she recovered consciousness she was lying on the ground, and Mrs. Cambridge was bending over her, with a troubled look on her austere face.

A REMARKABLE CASE.

A Boy 13 Years Old who has Only Spoken to Members of His Family and the Schoolmaster During His Life.

An Oswego reporter, while in Gilbert's Mills the other day, encountered a boy named Melvin Carey, who is an oddity in his way. Melvin is 13 years old, and of an appearance bright and intelligent.

"You are yourself," he said, gently. "And I love you." "What shall I do?" she exclaimed, despairingly.

"I mean," he said, "that you should always keep before you the recollection that there is a man who loves you more deeply than he can say, and that he is only awaiting your word to throw himself at your feet. I am not speaking dramatically. I speak the simple, sober truth."
