

An Appeal to Temperance Women.

Hear ye not the whispering voices,
Like a murmur o'er the waves?
Voices full of woe and sadness,
Coming from the drunkards' graves.
Mothers, Wives and Sisters, hear them!
From the shades of dark despair,
To your efforts now appealing;
Echoing voices everywhere.

Abel voices call for vengeance,
From the seething sin-cursed ground;
Slain by drink the Cain of bloodshed,
Direst curse the world has found.
Borne upon the gentle Zephyrs,
On the chilling northwinds blow;
From the balmy south we hear them
Dives' voices full of woe.

Praying you to warn their brothers,
Lost their fearful doom be theirs,
To avoid the rocks that wrecked them,
And the fiendish wreckers' snares.
Earnest women you beseeching
Not to faint or weary grow,
But with courage face the battle,
On to victory bravely go.

Women of our Temperance Unions,
Ever drinking stronghold raise,
God your captain leading onward,
An invincible cortege.
Can we wonder that the women,
Must go forth a war to wage,
Homes to save from drink's incursions,
'Gainst the traffic to engage.

For their loved ones are in danger,
Husbands, dearer far than life,
Who must meet the subtle demon
When engaged in business strife.
Sore beset at every corner,
Traps to catch unwary ones,
To beguile the unsuspecting,
Loving fathers, husbands, sons.

Putting on the guise of friendship,
Smiling while they pierce the soul,
With the dagger that will torture,
Make them cease the tempting bowl.
While the bloodhounds of the traffic,
With their eagle eyes behold,
Clutch with greedy claws their victims,
To allay their thirst for gold.

Heading not the desolation,
Nor the fearful wails that rise;
Nor the broken hearts that languish,
Mingled with the orphans' cries.
They in purple and fine linen,
Fearing sumptuous every day,
While the fools who fill their coffers,
Starve, or live as best they may.

Mothers you may truly tremble,
Lest you see as should go astray,
Who have left the sheltering fireside,
Seeking homes where'er they may;
Hadden pitfalls filled with demons,
Lark in ambush to despoil,
Could they see their machinations
From their lures they would recoil.

Daughters too though fair and lovely,
From the curse are not exempt,
Of their happiness entrusting,
Where the cup has power to tempt.
When their sun has set in darkness,
Faded with sorrow, shame and grief,
Yield to tipping vanity hoping,
Thus to find a short relief.

Use the privilege afforded,
By the franchise law, to vote
Choosing men whose word of honor,
Leaves no room to fear or doubt,
Who will do their utmost striving
To wipe out the liquor rose,
To our country's onward progress,
Baushing its fruits of woe.

Though discouraged by the forces,
That oppose on every hand,
Buckle on afresh your armor,
To emancipate our land.
A millennial peace diffusing,
Where despair hung like a pall,
Filing homes with hope and gladness,
Freed from Satan's liquor thral.
