Recalling the Ghastly Crime of a Whiskey

That notorious convict, Susan Kennedy, recently died of consumption in Kingston penitentiary, and the event recalls the cirumstances of one of the most fiendish and brutal crimes that disgrace the criminal records of this country. She lived in the Irish quarter of Montreal, known as Griffintown, and for years afterwards the murder for his mightness was seen by the engineer in his mightness was seen by the engineer in which she was condemned to the gallows, remained the great sensation of the city. Her victim was Mary Gallagher, who was butch-worshipped her. She came to friends and relatives in Montreal, with whom she remained for some time, but for reasons un-known she quarrelled with her people and secured a situation with a prominent citizen as a governess. Young, more than usually handsome, full of life and vigour, the spirited young Irish girl was courted and flattered. Soon afterwards, to the surprise of everyone who knew her, she was married to a common labourer by the name of Jacob Myers. Ugly stories got afloat and she was soon deserted by her friends. To drown her despair she took to drink. Rapidly the woman
