Golden Thoughts for Every Day.

Monday.—
They are coming! They are coming!
Who have been in darkness long;
They are coming to the Saviour
With a glad, triumphant song.
From the land beyond the ocean,
From the islands of the sea,
From the valleys and the mountains,
They are coming, Lord, to Thee.
Long they sat beneath the shadow
And the gloom of dreary night,
Waiting wearily the dawning
Of the promised heavenly light.
But they've heard the glorious gospel
Of salvation full and free;
Now they read the "blessed Bible."
They are coming, Lord, to Thee.

Tuesday—But is there any reason in the doctrine of a natural law which controls all things, and no God who controls law itself? It is said that a special divine providence implies an interference with the regular action of natural laws; a direct exercise of the divine will aside from or even opposed to their uniform operation; that is not philosophical to suppose that God shows partiality—that He sets aside for some men the laws which regulate the conduct of others; that He favors particular persons, families, and nations. It is said also that God works only through laws and never sets them aside. But this is begging the question. What are natural laws? In the lower elements of creation they may be described as the behavior of matter. Under the same conditions, matter, so far as we know, behaves in the same manner.—(Henry Ward Beecher.

Wednesday.—
Lord, hear wach Thy church is keeping
When shall earth Thy rule obey?
When shall end the night of weeping?
When shall break the promised day?
See the whitening harvest languish
Waiting still the laborer's toil;
Was it vain, Thy Son's deep anguish?
Shall the strong retain the spoil?
Tidings, sent to every creature,
Millions yet have never heard,
Can they hear without a preacher?
Lord Almighty, give the Word;
Give the word; in every nation
Let the gospel trumpet sound,
Witness a g world's salvation
To the earth's remotest bound.

Thursday—There are few men who are not ambitious of distinguishing themselves in the nation or country where they live, and of growing considerable among those with whom they converse. There is a kind of grandeur and respect which the meanest and most insignificant part of mankind endeavor to procure in the little circle of their friends and acquaintances. The poorest mechanic, nay, the man who lives upon common alms, gets him his set of admirers and delights in that superiority which he enjoys over those who are in some respects beneath him. This ambition, which is natural to the soul of man, might, methinks, receive a very happy turn, and, if it were rightly directed, contribute as much to a person's advantage as it generally does to his uneasiness and disquiet.—Addison.

Friday—
What throng is this, what noble troop, that
Arrayed in beautiful guise,
Out through the glorious city's open doors
To greet my wondering eyes?
The hosts of Christ's elected,
The jewels that He bears
In His own crown, selected
To wipe away my tears.
Of prophets great, and patriarchs high, a band
That once has borne the cross,
With all the company that won that land,
By counting gain for loss,
Now float in freedom's highness,
From tyrant's chains set free,
And shine like suns in brightness
Arrayed to welcome me. —Anonymous.

Saturday—He said to them, when speaking of this future life, and the home in which that future life will be lived, "If it were not so, I would have told you—if there were no future life, no future home for you I would have plainly told you; I would not have allowed you by My silence to have cherished hopes that could never be fulfilled: but not only have you My silence, but I give you My authoritative and explicit statement that there is such a life and there is such a home."—Dr. Cunningham.

The Spirit of the Day.

The spirit of the present day is that of work for humanity, and whoever does not feel this is out of touch with the forces of his time, and thus misses all that vast support of invisible but most potent strength that he would otherwise receive. Selfishness isolates. If an individual sets out proposing to work for himself, only, he is at the same disadvantage in the tide of affairs that a man would be who proposed to manufacture all his own clothing, and raise or capture all his own food, and build his own house and make all his own furniture, rather than to enter into the great scheme of co-operation with the world, and do some one thing for all, while each in turn, of all humanity, does some one thing for him. In these closing years of a cycle we are entering into such a new atmosphere of spiritual forces that the only safety, the only success, is to draw constantly toward the nobler ideals and test our daily life by the higher standards. Selfishness, self-interest are corrosive in their action on the true gold of life. They undermine all its foundations, and leave nothing on which to stand.

RUSSIA'S STARVING PEOPLE.

An Englishman Sends Very Highly Colored Pictures of the Famine.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily Telegraph sends a long and harrowing account of the condition of the people in the famine districts of Russia. Though the distress is undoubtedly intense, the pictures given by the correspondent are thought to be overdrawn. In fact, his letter is filled with glaring errors, and his displays of ignorance are many.

He states that whole towns containing 30,000 to 50,000 people are petitioning the Government to allow them to migrate to China or elsewhere. He also asserts that suicide has become enormously rife since the famine set in. Unfortunately Russian papers are entirely devoid of news about the famine. The intensity of the distress, however, may be judged from the fact that in many places the elementary schools have been closed on account of lack of funds. A circular has been issued by the Minister of the Interior, which enumerates thirteen governments in which the people are completely famine stricken and eight in which a partial famine prevails.

CONDITION OF THE PEASANTS.

The correspondent says: "Dispatches from the interior are most alarming. The August frosts destroyed the barley crop, the staple food in Archangel. In the extreme North the crops have been destroyed by rains. Straw from thatched roofs is utilized for fodder. Cattle are dying by wholesale on the roadsides. Various Ministers have issued conflicting orders, resulting in utter chaos. The grants of seed corn have been stopped. Immense tracts of land are lying waste, and a scarcity of corn is threatened in 1892. The cattle plague has broken out in many places. Peasants in Segovsky attacked some veterinary surgeons who had been sent to destroy infected cattle, and several were wounded in the skirmish. Clergymen are becoming beggars. Women are selling themselves to support their children. No work can be secured by the starving persons, even on the Volga. The new loan will only be a drop in the ocean. A large budget deficit is certain, and to make matters worse a million loads of rye promised by the Governor of a neighboring province, and on which the Ministry had relied, do not exist. The discovery has caused consternation. The famine is expected to reach its acme in November. The peasants threaten a revolution unless the Czar gives them relief from private sources. Partial risings are reported in Yekaterinoslav, Nijni-Novgorod and Mazan, the great fair which is annually held at Nijni-Novgorod, and which is attended by merchants and dealers from all parts of Russia was a failure this year. This was due to the great number of bankrupts and their consequent withdrawal from trade.

VILE KINDS OF FOOD.

"What little food it is possible for the peasants to obtain is of the vilest description, but so sharp are the pangs of hunger that they gladly eat what at other times they would not touch. In many cases their only food is the sweepings and refuse from the flour mills. In Saratoff the landowners found this refuse so injurious to their cattle that they would not feed it to them. But, though it was not fit for cattle to eat, the landowners made bread of it and sold it to the peasants. Bread made of finely chopped straw and bran mixed with a very small quantity of rye is considered a godsend.

In many villages the peasants have nailed up their huts and left their communes to scour the country in search of work. Hundreds of them have failed in their search and are begging along the roadsides. In numerous cases the seed corn which was furnished the peasants by the Government has been eaten instead of planted, and the land is lying fallow. Notwithstanding these terrible conditions, taxes continue to be extorted from the starving people. Everything is taken from them to satisfy the tax-gatherers. Where the peasants display any unwillingness to pay the collectors resort to force to extort the money. The knout is extensively used by the officers of the Tax Collecting Department of Russia."

"The peasant boards have sent petitions to the ministry praying that the taxes and arrears of taxes may be wiped out. The petitioners declare that the Government will be obliged to maintain the impoverished people for fourteen months, and that it will be utterly impossible for them to pay the taxes."

A MORE CAREFUL STATEMENT.

A St. Petersburg dispatch says that while exaggerated reports of the famine in certain provinces of Russia have been given currency, the suffering is undoubtedly appalling. It is not true, however, that starving peasants are subjected to the knout for non-payment of taxes, or that there is any danger of revolution. In fact, in the provinces chiefly afflicted the people are without either the physical strength or the weapons to attempt revolution, even if they had any capable leaders. It is true that bands of desperate men rove about the country committing acts of brigandage, but they scatter at the first sight of the troops, or even of the police.

The large majority of the famine stricken yield to blank despair and the authorities would not be displeased to see them show some of the energy that a disposition to revolt would indicate. It is calculated that the empire will lose, owing to the famine, from twelve to fourteen millions of rubles in taxes in the Volga provinces alone. The famines in other regions is scattered in spots and an estimate of the loss is more difficult.

It is not likely that those advocates of temperance who argue that the use of wines and malt liquors tends to lessen the consumption of distilled liquors will cite the experience of Germany in support of their contention. Recent statistics show that while the consumption of the lighter liquors has steadily advanced, the use of the more fiery beverages has also increased at an alarming rate. Within eight years the cases of chronic alcoholism and delirium tremens treated in public institutions in Germany increased from 4,272 to 10,360, the latter figure including 673 women. Little wonder that the anxieties of German statesmen should be aroused and that they should be contemplating the imposition of greater restrictions upon the traffic.

"You had better accept Mr. Hippie," said Mrs. Elder to her daughter; "it is your last chance." "Then you think this is the court of last resort, do you, mamma?" asked the girl.

BIRCHALL'S INTENDED VICTIM.

Pelly Returns to Canada and is Doing Well After His Remarkable Experience.

A few weeks ago a tourist among the mountains along the Canadian Pacific Railroad met young Mr. Pelly, who figured in the famous Birchall murder case in Canada. It will be recalled that Pelly went to Canada with Birchall to be his partner in the imaginary farm which Birchall's dupes supposed to be in Canada, near the American line. It was Pelly whom Birchall took to ahigh bank overlooking the Niagara River with the intention, it is believed, of pushing him over into the foaming river and thus adding another murder to his record. After the Birchall trial, in which Pelly was one of the principal witnesses, he went to England, but soon returned and has been engaged in an executive capacity during the building of the railroad between Calgary and Edmonton. When the tourist met him in the Selkirk Mountains he was on his way to Vancouver for a vacation.

Pelly is an entertaining young fellow who has travelled extensively, knows the Alps well, and has even been to Central Africa. A few years ago he had a chance to join a party travelling to Lake Nyassa. He improved the opportunity, saw the scenery of the lower Zambesi, hunted hippopotami in the Shiri River, visited the fine town of Biantyre in the Nyassa highlands, and saw that beautiful lake.

Pelly thinks Birchall was the most plausible man he ever met, and was well calculated to deceive the shrewdest if he set about the task. The young man thinks he had a very narrow escape, and he will answer no more advertisements of Englishmen who want partners to join them in the farming industry in America.

A Lame Defence.

A singular defence of the expulsion of the Jews by the Russian Government has been published in England and is said to be attracting much attention. "Expulsions," it says, "are entirely due to Jewish violations of the law." Jews entitled to live in the cities have, by forged permits, gained a settlement in the central provinces from which they are excluded. "Numbers of mechanics have forsaken their regular occupation and have taken to peddling, thus violating the conditions under which they were allowed to settle." Others have left the town to which they were confined, and others have built houses, which is forbidden by law. Then when the law is enforced there is a great outcry, "but every Jew so expelled courted his own fate." This argument is ingenious if not ingenious, but it fails wholly to reach much less excuse the evils that have excited the indignation of the civilized world. The press of this continent or of Europe has never defended the infraction of law. But it is the harsh laws which Russia has framed against the Jews that are so barbarous and cruel. To limit within narrow bounds a man's home, simply on account of his race—a race that has no country—that is despotic and cruel. To forbid men from changing their occupation, or from adopting any honest occupation, that is a crime against liberty. To prohibit to an honorable person and a citizen the purchase of houses or other legitimate property, that is tyrannical. All these laws furthermore tend to incite the very evils they would cure, to promote vice and incite disloyalty. It is on account of this anti-Jewish code that Russia is condemned, and justly. If a law is cruel and subversive of liberty, it is no excuse to the Government which punishes violation of such a law that the one punished knew what he was doing.

No Danger of War.

The New York Tribune explains the various sensational war rumors that have recently occupied so conspicuous a place in the European press, and which have more or less alarmed all classes, even influencing the money markets, by the fact that this is the "dead" season when the various parliaments and legislatures are taking their recess and when consequently there is a great scarcity of the ordinary political news with which its pages are regularly filled. Owing to the great dearth of facts, the purveyors of news have been tempted to dress up the few trivial incidents that are occurring and to invest them with an importance and meaning never intended by those taking part therein. Thus of the Sigi affair, which was interpreted to signify the throwing down of the gauntlet by England to Russia, the Tribune says: "English sailors and marines have often landed before on the islands of the Turkish archipelago for purposes of gun-drill or picnic and nothing was ever thought of it." That there is no reason for alarm, or for concluding that the war so long-threatened is about to break out forthwith is evident, the Tribune thinks, from the fact that "the Czar is amusing himself at Copenhagen without seeing any of the Ministers, and that Lord Salisbury has not deemed it necessary to interrupt his holiday at Dieppe to visit either the Foreign Office in London or the Queen at Balmoral."

A Remarkable Dog.

According to Forest and Stream, there is a most remarkable dog in Hamilton. He is a rough haired mongrel terrier and rejoices in the name of "Jack, the policeman's dog." Fifteen years ago his master, a night watchman, was shot while on duty. The dog, who was with him, ran home and, by whining at the door and scratching, attracted the attention of the inmates, whom he at once guided to his dying master. For the three days that the man lingered between life and death the dog lay at the foot of his bed and never stirred until the body was removed to the cemetery, when he followed in the funeral procession to the grave. Thence he went to the police station, and every night since then he has attended the men while on duty. At six a. m. when the men are lined up for dismissal, the dog takes up his post at the head of the line. On the command, "Dismiss" being given, he barks and immediately disappears down the street, running at his utmost speed. No one knows where he goes nor what he lives on. All but his "public" life is a mystery. In the miscellaneous class at the Hamilton show his entry reads: "395. Hamilton Police Force. Jack, the policeman's dog (rough terrier), fifteen years old. Not for sale." Miss Whitney awarded him vhc., doubtless more in recognition of his unique reputation than anything else.

He (nervously)—"I—I wish to express my feelings; may I?" She (coldly)—"This is not an express office."
