Stop the Leaks

Every farmer should, by a simple system of book-keeping, keep a careful check on his receipts and expenditures, so as to know exactly which of his farming operations are yielding him a profit. which are conducted at a loss, and which are causing him merely to "mark time." A little figuring of this sort may reveal to him a number of little leaks which almost imperceptibly drain away the profits that should reward his labor. In these days of fierce competition it is only by keeping down the cost of production and preventing all waste that farming can be made successful. Some sources of loss are here given which will readily suggest others.

Lack of System. Sarms is the loss of time and energy because the management is not carried out on any definite system. A study of any old and successful busimess will show that success has been Fargely due to a methodical and systematic way of doing things. System may be carried too far so as to become merely mechanical, but as a general proposition it may be said that after a well-defined plan of action has been determined on it should be rigidly carried out. As more knowledge is gained, or new ideas acquired, it will he necessary to make changes in the i cutine, but no change should be made without due deliberation. All work should be carefully planned in adwance, and all tools and implements gotten ready so that there may be no delay when operations actually begin.

Use of Time Tables. All men employed on the farm should have well-defined duties to perform so that their time may be used purposes. to the best advantage. A good system provides for the feeding of stock at regular hours each day. When stock are fed and watered at regular hours they become accustomed to the regularity of feeding, and thrive much better than if fed at different Lours on each sucreeding day.

Care of Implements.

Much time is lost by farmers during busy seasons, such as seeding, having and harvest, because a bolt or some other small part has been lost, and a trip to blacksmith shop or foundry is necessary to replace it. This waste of valuable time might be prevented by a little forethought, or examination of the implement before. it was required for use. In many gases implements are purchased which the farmer could well do without.

Keeping Unnecessary Stock.

This is another frequent cause of loss. If a farmer has more horses than are required to carry on the work of the farm, he should sell those he does not need, if a figure at all reasonable can be obtained. The cow which does not yield enough milk or butter Jewitt, Stanley Casely. to pay a good profit on her keep should be disposed of, and her place filled by another. A few weeks' use of the scales and Babcock tester will usually furnish some surprising results in this direction.

Neglect of Fences and Buildings.

Another leak which takes money out of the farmers' pocket is neglect in keeping fences and buildings in proper repair. Inferior fences allow his own and his neighbor's stock to injure his crops, and are a source of constant worry and loss of time. The old proverb, "For the want of a nail the horse was lost," is very appropriate in such a case. A dollar or two spent for lumber and nails will often result in a large saving of feed and increased comfort to the stock during the winter months. Neglect of a leaky roof is often responsible for heavy losses of grain or fodder and in the timbers of the buildings. Many a good frame has been ruined by a leaky roof.

Lack of Knowledge.

Nearly all the leaks previously menfioned may be set down to carelessness, but farmers also lose because some of them think that nothing can be learned from others, and that a Street, two dozen Grain Bags. The new idea is necessarily nonsense. No matter how good a farmer a man may be, he can still gain ideas from others that will prove of value to him.
