The Saving Of A Sole

Wo'Wo unto to him I say, who attaineth eminence in polishing his uppers and neglects his sole.

For be it said, that though his sole reacheth a state of holiness, he drieth further from salvation.

A man's sole is the foundation of his understanding, and what profit hath he if he displays diligence towards his uppers, and dilatoriness towards his sole.

Therefore I say unto you be wise, for though thy sole is hidden from the sight of other men when you are vertical, perchance there may come a time when you are horizontal, and behold the state of thy sole is apparent.

The weakness of a man's sole is often his undoing, for it is known to the wise that traps for the unwise are plentiful on the face of the earth, sometimes placed there by the hand of a child, and nature sometimes hath a hand in this.

The unwise man who steppeth from his dwelling in the early hours, with his head held high, dreaming of his daily tasks, and is proudly conscious of his ability to overcome all obstructions, seemeth to look where he placeth his feet, comes in contact with something tangible that brings him sharply back from his flights of imagination to the more serious thought—that his sole is not all that it should be, so he sayeth unto himself, I must hie me to the man who ministereth to these things.

So in the course of time it comes to pass, that the visit to the man who ministereth to these things can no longer be delayed, and with many misgivings as to the number of shekels he will have to part with he telleth his tale of woe, finding excuses in plenty to account for his tardiness in not coming before.

And what findeth he? Doth he find that he hath to deal with an ogre, or an usurer, a den of thieves, or of ferocious beasts? Nay, he findeth none of these things, but rather is he greeted with soft words, and a kindly smile and when he is assured that his wealth will not be considerably decreased his heart rejoiceth, and he leaves the presence of him who ministereth to the needs of neglected soles, and there cometh to his mind a song of the ancients, and regardless of the passers by, he lifteth up his voice saying "Are we downhearted?" and the passers by answered him saying "No".

So take heed ye unwatchful ones. Be not as the virgins who were foolish. Omit not the means whereby you may prevent your feet from coming in contact with the hard and stony path, as the foolish virgins omitted from their lamps the necessary means of illumination.

Harden not your heart, but let thine ear list to the anguished cry of thy sole. Hasten, so that its wailings may cease, owing to the alleviation of its sufferings.

By this means only will you save your sole, and have a better footing amongst your fellowmen.

IN MEMORIAM

BURR—In loving memory of my wife Jessie A. Burr who departed this life May 14th 1920.

Ever faithful and lovingly true. Now entered into rest.

Husband

HELEN DABINETT, Died May 1st. 1921.

There is no Death; life's fulgent, flowing river,
Majestic merges, in a boundless sea,
And time dethroned, recedes without forever,
Exquisite homeland! of the soul to be.

And fame, and wealth, their domination leading,
To paths alluring, and perchance, astray,
While truth entrenched, intensifies its pleading,
For ears to listen, and for souls to pray.

Like well loved voices, long since silent, calling,
Along life's pathway, where so ere we stray,
No mandate loving, potent, and entralling,
The trails of godness, are the only way.

A. B. D.
