U.S. ARMY FLIERS COMPLETE WORLD TRIP

Forced to Descend in Casco Bay, Maine, by Heavy Fog.

A despatch from Portland, Maine, says:-Lieut. Lowell H. Smith, Commander of the United States Army world flight, and his two companions, Lieut. Erik H. Nelson and Lieut. Leigh Wade, were forced down by fog in Casco Bay on Friday in their flight from Pictou, N.S. Their planes were not damaged, and the flight to Boston thus interrupted will be concluded on Saturday if the weather is favorable.

The fliers came ashore at Mere Point, near Brunswick, and arranged to spend the night at summer cottages.

The flight started at Pictou Friday morning with good weather, but as Lord Glenavy's difficult job is to pre- 61/2c; primes, 6c. the planes came down from the Bay side over the affairs of the Senate of of Fundy and headed along the Maine the Irish Free State. gave to the press a brief account of the experiences of the fliers.

"We ran into fog most of the way down the coast," he said. "When we reached Casco Bay it was dense, but we hoped we could make our way along a little farther, in the thought that we might strike clear weather. It could not be done, and we looked around for a landing place."

. Boston, Sept. 7 .- With a national presidential salute of twenty-one guns flashing in their ears, the U.S. army around-the-world fliers floated down on Boston Harbor at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon, completing their last jump over seas.

They arrived after a flight of 135 miles in little less than two hours from Casco Bay, Me., where a thick fog forced them down Friday. They settled in sheltered water off Noddle Island, the army's airport in East Bos ton, at 2.10 o'clock.

Although Maine soil was the first in the United States they touched after their epochal circumterrestrial flight, their arrival here was their official return to this country, and it was attended with pomp, ceremony and a tremendous display of enthusiasm that indelibly imprinted itself upon those who witnessed it.
