Summerless Summer Was Idle Prophecy

The ideal weather of the past week gives notice that the time has come for recalling the prediction of 1927 was to be a year without a summer. Of course, the summer of 1927 is not yet over, and it is possible that anything yet may happen, but conditions so far are against the summerless prediction. Conditions so far are in favor of an early summer and plenty of it.

But should the predictions fail we may be sure that the weather prophets will not go out of business. The expert prophets who make use of all the aids of science can give them, assure us that it is not possible to forecast the weather for more than a few hours ahead, and even then they deal in probabilities rather than a certainties; but the weather prophets are no more deterred by the limitations of science than they are by their own failures. The theory seems to be that if one keeps guessing all the time he is likely to hit it right once in a while, and the lucky guesses are remembered while the failures are forgotten.

PATRONIZE YOUR PAPER
We have frequently endeavored to point out the advantages of newspaper advertising as compared to handbills and this week we have had complaints which bear out our contention. Household holders throughout the town are complaining of the bills delivered around town which are littering the lawns to such an extent that they have become a nuisance around the town and are very unsightly. The town foreman recently had occasion to investigate a culvert which was filled in and failed to function. To his surprise he found that bunches of handbills deposited there were the cause of the trouble. It is poor business for merchants and business men to spend money on this type of so-called advertising. Admittedly the bills which are practically littering the streets and lawns are not read and we have no evidence that the town foreman patronized the store whose bills he found in the culvert.
