FAIRIES
When the fairies have a picnic, they always tidy up. It would be most disgraceful to leave a broken cup. They roll up bits of paper and hide the orange skin. And find the most convenient hole to put the rubbish in. When fairies have a picnic, they put their fires out. For fear that brother wind should come and scatter it about. They leave a pile of brush wood, for that is always drier. For other picnic people who want to light a fire. When fairies have a picnic they never break the trees. But smooth the grass and daisy buds as gently as you please. And packing up their baskets, they softly steal away. And leave the place all beautiful for some one else to play. I. H. Jenkinson
