THE PRICE OF FRIENDSHIP

Amongst the very precious things we possess, perhaps it is our friends we neglect the most. It is so easy to let them slip through our fingers one by one, until the day arrives when we find ourselves wondering what has become of them. We may be so absorbed in our work, in building up a business, and amassing a fortune, that we spare little time and effort for our pals. Someday we may realize what a mistake it is. So for ever remember that the older we get the harder it is to form real friendship. After school and college days are over, at least after the twenties are past other motives enter into our associations and the qualities and contributions of real friendship are not as pure in motive.

Now, if we would have friends we must be friendly. We must, as I have referred, give time to our friends and a place for them must be made in our thoughts. We cannot learn anything, or master any subject without giving it considerable attention. We can not have much of a garden unless we cultivate it. Yet there are those who imagine they can neglect their friends, think solely of themselves; and are surprised and hurt when the past is brought home to them that the friendships once so strong, helpful and satisfying have ceased to exist.

How many friends have you? I mean those to whom you can pour out all that is in you. Have you one person with whom you can have a good gossip in complete confidence? One who always cheers you, and understands you. Take few chances with such, cultivate them, go more than half way with them—have a cup of tea, pass a cigarette—find time for them.

We find out our real friends when our luck is out. When we were prosperous we felt we were loved for what we were, and not for the crumbs falling from the table. Perhaps the day came when the lime light did not play upon us, when we were obliged to keep down, and we found they were not quite so anxious to be friendly—and we began to wonder whether they ever really cared as all. But we must even remember that our friends are not a form of insurance against popularity, and maybe if we don't expect too much we shall be surprised in the days of adversity.

Remember what we owe our friends. The women that have inspired us; the man who gave us a chance, possibly the first bit of business that meant so much at the time. The old folk who gave us a welcome to this and that place, whose homely comforts we have ceased to need. Maybe we have neglected them a little. Its a long time since we saw them, why not write a letter. They are older, a little stern perhaps about certain modern tendencies; but remember the advice we used to note on a match box "rub lightly" it is the only way to kindle a flame.

We so seldom get to understand our friends when they are cross and irritable. We do not see that things may be hard at times if we knew their trouble, the weariness of their work, the sheer dull monotony of some lives the same old job, the same of old street car, the same old rush, morning and night, to retire as night wearied out, and the same old rush all year again the next day. So it is over after year, at the same old machine, the same old typewriter, or it is the same old farm on some dull concession road, toil, toil and more toil, no reading, no contact with other minds, and only the same old trip to town. It is the consideration and understanding of these facts that keep the flame of friendship bright.

The higher one climbs the lonelier one becomes—Its the price we pay for advanced position. The loneliest man on the ship is the captain. He walks the bridge alone, he has no equals.

The office staff work together and have so much in common, while the manager sits in his palatial office above. The soldier enjoys his comrades—but the general walks alone, with his inferiors a little to the rear. Perhaps the bitterest cup the successful are called upon to drink is the loneliness there position entails. Every-thing has its price, especially success. Again, to have friends we must pay the price, and the price is for the most part paid in time, thought and under-

"MONKEY BUSINESS"

Recently, I overheard echoes of that persistent evolutionary theory in regard to man's ancestry—"Man is descended from Monkeys" said one. Gone is the inordinate desire to furnish every room of the house after the manner of those demonstrated in the "Ladies Home Journal." Not for a moment will a man swallow in large gulps every opinion expressed in the barber shop, garage, hotel lobby and other places where men foregather. Rather the individual rejoices in the accumulated experience of a goodly number of years on this planet—forming as it does the basis of his thought and judgment. Whoever says very much originality in the ably young? It belongs to maturity. The consequence is, we observe in the older person less monkey, not nearly so much mimicry, but far more man.

emies, may adopt the opinions moral and otherwise of the crowd. All too numerous is that vast body of folks whose opinions about this, that and everything are the identical views of the last person with whom they have held conversation. They speak loudly of their convictions, when really they are not convictions at all—Rather they are prejudices, and possibly this forms the least attractive form of imitation which in itself is far from flattering.

Eventually, the time comes when imitation falls into the background, and the dominant desire is to be one's own simple self. All the mimicry of previous years is ground through the mill of one's personality and the result is high originality—the older we become the more is this condition an evidence—No longer does the lad wish to throw stones or cocoanuts; no longer the maid assumes the style, manners, and curls of Mary Pickford.
