(By Elsie Ess)

LEGENDS OF HALLOWE'EN

Old superstitions die hard, and it will be a long time before the custom of celebrating Hallowe'en goes out of fashion.

Hallowe'en is the evening of the day which precedes what is known as All Saints Day in the Christian Calendar.

Long before the Christian faith was adopted among the untutored people of Ancient Britain, October thirty-first was the harvest season, and the strange priests of the still stranger Druidic religion built bonfires on the hill tops in Britain, Ireland, and France, in honour of the Sun God.

The Druids gathered, clad in snow white robes, at the altar of stones on a hill. On the altar was an emblem of the divinity they worshipped together with the sacred fire which had been kept alive during the past year.

At a given signal the white robed figures grouped themselves around it and quenched the fire. Then a new fire was kindled on the hill, and the assembled multitude raised a mighty shout and from every eminence for miles around other fires blazed into view.

The same night the fire was put out in every cabin and farmhouse only to be rekindled with embers from the sacred fire of the priests which was believed to protect the homestead from peril so long as it remained burning.

The people believed in fairies, goblins, and witches, and it was on this night that the spell of the witch was potent, and to guard against the mischievous works of the elves, people followed closely every rite laid down by the Druid priests.

As the Druidic faith faded before the advance of Christianity the pagan festival lost much of its pomp and former significance and assumed a different mode of celebration. So on the night of October thirty-first the simple country folks of Ireland and Scotland added new superstitions to the day, and all sorts of curious stories are told of the weird happenings of this night.

In Scotland, England, or Germany the vigil of All Saints Day is no longer a religious observance. With the Latin races it is merely a religious vigil, and around it's observances cling few, if any, of those wild legends or superstitions that are so plentiful in Scandinavia, parts of Scotland and Ireland.

In the sixth century Hallowe'en was known as "Witches' Night" or the "Devil's Sunday," and an old Scotch legend tells of the frightful origin of this particular night when the devil is supposed to have charge of things. He assembled all the witches together before going on their revels, each witch was anointed with a preparation made of fat of unbaptised infants.

Another legend tells how the devil made his head round on Hallowe'en and appeared about the houses and in the forests where he frightened everyone who came near him.

It was also claimed that all sorts of supernatural beings roamed about on Hallowe'en and from these secrets of the future might be learned, and this accounts for some of the rather curious customs that persist to this day.

Old ideas die hard, they linger and live, and each generation enters in and enjoys the regime of mischief and make-belief for one night in the year.
