

EYES and EARS

(By Elsie Ess)

DIMENSIONS OF LIFE

Naturally and wisely we do all we possibly can to prolong life, but a long life is not necessarily the most worth while. Length is not the only dimension of life. It is possible to live a long time and not accomplish very much. Life is not to be measured by the hands of the dial, the question is not so much, "How old are you?" as it is "How much have you seen, felt, loved, achieved, or done?" What of the quality of life? What of the other dimensions, the breadth, depth and height? Life should be symmetrical. The tragedy of human life is that it is so ill-balanced; no depth of conviction, no aspiration, no width of thought or sympathy. All too often it is like the dark lady at the fair who disliked the roundabouts because you got on, and rode, and got off without getting any place. It is not how long we live that matters so much, thi swas proved during the war. Abraham Lincoln's career was not a long one, but few have influenced their fellows more than he. Mr. Gladstone formed a ministry three times after he was sixty years of age. I have also read of a certain patriot who lived six hundred and sixty-nine years, begat sons and daughters, and then died. It is possible to live a long time with little breadth, depth, or height to life.

are your contacts? This is an age of specialists, and specialist undoubtedly produce splendid work if not splendid men. Charles Darwin, sharp and bright in his own field, claimed to have lost his taste for good literature, so concentrated were his energies. A narrowness of sympathy will starve one's capacity for charity. Let your sympathy get the point of views of others. To see things as they see them, is to reduce a hundred fold the difference of opinion that lead to strife and suffering.

Some have no depth; altogether superficial, no principles of action. Sometimes we hear it said of one that when he was poor, he was kind and generous; now he is rich and prosperous—he is still the same. One man lives with scoffers, but he does not change a bit. These have a depth of conviction. The difference is like a tree and a post; the former has roots and draws nourishment from their environment; the latter is a dead thing, and instead of growing stronger, it becomes weaker and finally it rots.

When it comes to height, the most important of all, we find there can be little height without depth. Your height is determined by your desire and your aspiration.

"Two men looked from their prison bars,
One saw the mud, and the other
the stars."

How broad is your life? How wide

So if you would so live as to derive much from life, and be able to contribute something to those other lives about you, see that you live symmetrically. That the dimensions of life are length, breadth, depth, and height, and so attain a certain measure of poise, proportion, elegance and beauty.
