Health Service

OF THE Canadian Medical Association

GRANT FLEMING, M.D. ASSOCIATE SECRETARY

THE EPILEPTIC CHILD

The vast majority who suffer from epilepsy experience their first seizures early in life. This is a matter of extreme importance for parents, because parents must know that there should not be any delay in securing medical attention for the condition. Treatment should begin at once. Unfortunately, the disease is usually incurable, but treatment is successful in some cases, and if it is to be most helpful, it must start before the disease has become chronic.

Some cases of epilepsy are due to brain injury, following fracture of the skull, for example. Cases of this type are often helped or cured by surgical treatment. The cause in the vast majority of cases is not known. Heredity is an important factor. The disease appears in two main forms, the major and the minor.

In the minor form, there may be simply loss of consciousness for a moment or two. The child stops what he is doing, and sits or stands with his eyes fixed and staring; the face is somewhat pale. In a few moments however, he starts again where he left off. He may fall or may make certain movements. From this mild type, the disease grades out into the major form.

The major form has two outstanding symptoms, muscular spasm and unconsciousness. The attack is sudden, although many patients experience a warning sensation of "aurs" which precedes the attack. The aura is followed quickly by abrupt loss of consciousness. The patient falls in he is not already lying down. The muscles are first held contracted, the face turns blue, and then for a minute or two, follows a twitching or jerking of the muscles. Consciousness returns, the patient may be dazed, and he frequently passes into a deep sleep.

Every epileptic should receive prompt medical care. Physical defects should be corrected, and the health of the child built up. The child must be prepared for life by firm, but kind and understanding care. The child will have to be watched and trained with regard to his habits. Overeating, excitement and exposure are to be avoided. It will be necessary to select an occupation that is within the child's mental capacity and which will at the same time be safe for an epileptic.

We cannot be optimistic about epilepsy, but we do know that by proper treatment and training, a great deal can be done, provided the case receive early attention.
