His Amazing Love

(By Josephine Kane)

I was hurrying across the small plot of grass between the Hospital and the Nurses' Residence one fine morning on the way to my office when I encountered a youth loitering around.
 "Are you wanting anything?" "Yes, I'm just waiting to see Nurse Robinson." "Well you'll hardly see her this early as, no doubt, she is on duty." "Oh yes I will, for I 'phone her I'd be waiting around here about ten, and that she could see me by looking out of the window, but she hasn't come yet." He was very confident.
 I scented a romance right there and asked a few leading questions which brought forth: "Yes, he'd been a patient in the Hospital for five weeks, had been operated upon for Mastoiditis." He had no difficulty in pronouncing the word, I noticed—"and did I think Nurse Robinson could be long?" I did not, "for," I said, "it is my firm intention of telephoning right away, and telling her that there is a fine upstanding chap looking up at her window, and that I'll bring her on the run, I know."

 He smiled, with some confusion, but with evident relief. "What Ward is he on, Ward J? All right, you wait just where you are for one minute."
 I could not reach my office quickly enough; I was thrilled at my find. There was a youngster anxiously waiting outside of a Hospital to obtain a glimpse of his nurse! Could you conceive anything quite so lovely? One could imagine that the whole Hospital episode would make him eager to put miles between him and the place. But no, there he was, hungering for a look at the one who had sent over him in his pain. Just what enderness, understanding of his plight, and real palship, had "Nurse Robinson" shown that had irresistibly drawn him back to her?
 There were the thoughts that chased through my mind as I tried, almost frantically, to get the switch-board, and my heart blessed her.
 "Oh dear, line busy!" Another minute's wait, and still busy. It was really ridiculous how impatient I was. I gave a hurried glance through the window. Yes, he was still there, gazing intently towards the building. At last: "Is that Miss Robinson, yes? Well for mercy sake do take time to show yourself at the back window, and view your young Romeo. Yes, Tommie L., do you remember him?" Well step on the gas and end his agony of waiting, it's pathetic to see. With a merry laugh, and "I will," the receiver was hung up.
 I looked out again. There he stood, with such a pleased and satisfied look on his young face. I feel impatient at my inability to picture him thus for others to see; the eager eyes, and such a winning shyness in his attitude as he stood there in the early morning sunlight, straight and slim as a sapling, with his arm up-raised drawing her gaze in his direction, and to my, perhaps romantic, eyes, showing just a hint of his not-too-far-away manhood. He was just twelve.
 When he was leaving, I called him into my office. I was anxious to talk further with him, to draw him out, and obtain if I could, something of what was in his heart. But alas! he was not of the fulsome kind, and his eyes questioned: "Why all this interest?" "Oh, it hadn't been too bad; he wouldn't mind being back, only for the sick part, and of course he wouldn't like to be operated upon again for he might die." "Were the nurses good to him?" "Well, he'd say so, they were great!" That was about all he would commit himself to in words, but I had seen his eyes, and he had come back to the Hospital. That was enough to fire by imagination. "Come back again soon," I said as he left, "to see me as well as Nurse Robinson."
 I sat down quietly at my desk, stirred at what had, so unexpectedly, been granted to me—the manifestation of an adoring love of a small patient for his nurse. A most wonderful movie had been enacted right before my astonished eyes, on a stage presenting a little green sward behind the towering walls of a large and old institution, the Hospital for Sick Children, Toronto. I wish others could have shared it with me, but my eyes alone had seen it.
 Had I been depressed that morning as I started out for my office? Well just a little, perhaps, but not now. The whole work had been glorified for me, and magnified. How privileged to be on the staff of an institution where not only were ailing little ones nursed back to health and strength, but where such an atmosphere of tender and understanding love abounded as to make these youngsters eager to come back "to see Nurse Robinson," and which made possible such a lovely scene as I had witnessed. Was my hare in it, humble as it was, worth while? I had been shown it was.
 And so I am going to ask you to help us in this work of curing the sick little ones of Ontario. The need for funds is most urgent. Last year we nursed 7,511 patients in our cots and gave 93,789 treatments at our Out-Patient Department. This does not begin to tell the immensity of the work accomplished, it merely gives you a glimpse of what it must have been. Your contribution may be sent care of the Secretary-Treasurer, Hospital for Sick Children, Toronto.
 No amount is too small—"Many little mak' a muckle."

GIRDING THE WORLD WITH CHRISTMAS TREES

Each Christmas it is estimated that approximately ten million trees are cut for the Canadian and American market. According to the Freight Traffic Department of the Canadian National Railways an average of about 350 cars of Christmas trees are shipped annually to the cities of Canada and the United States. As each car contains in the neighborhood of 600 trees, the annual cut in the Dominion alone, exclusive of trees hauled by trucks to neighboring points, amounts to more than 200,000 trees. It is pointed out, however, that this gigantic cut does not devastate the forests, as in all districts where big orders are filled the trees are carefully selected with a view of accomplishing the natural thinning of the growth, so that those which remain will have an opportunity of attaining a healthy girth. And as each tree is cut, another is usually planted in a different section, so that the reforestation goes on under expert supervision. There are, however, isolated districts where the system reforestation has not penetrated but such sections are growing smaller and smaller each year. The trees for cutting are usually selected in the late summer and early fall, and the actual cut begins about three weeks before Christmas. Apart from the serving of the Canadian markets, the big Eastern markets for Christmas trees are New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Detroit and Chicago, and the provinces from which the biggest exports are made are the Maritime, Quebec and Ontario. It is computed that were the annual cut of Christmas trees planted a quarter of a mile apart at the equator, it would girdle the globe four and a half times.
