The "Chateau Laurier" well known Canadian National Railway Hotel in Ottawa will be a busy place for several weeks now with the first session of the new parliament under way. The "Chateau" is the seasonal residence of many of the members and senators and at all periods of the year is the headquarters for many of the social activities of the capitol. Also during the parliamentary session there are many extra guests composed both of visitors to the session and others who have business with the government. The hotel is one of the most beautiful and spacious of the Canadian National chain, but as large as it is, it is often unable to meet the demand that is made on it for room accommodation at this period of the year. Our advice to persons who contemplate visiting the capitol is to arrange in advance by letter or wire for room accommodation at the Chateau.

HEALTH

"STROKE"

Because of its sudden onset, apoplexy or cerebral haemorrhage is popularly called a "stroke." In the midst of his ordinary activities, the victim suddenly falls and remains deeply unconscious, usually with a flushed face, and his breathing laboured and noisy.

Not all cases occur so suddenly, some experience a period of general discomfort with dizziness and headache before consciousness is lost. Strokes happen more often to men than to women, and usually occur after middle life. They are due to a haemorrhage in the brain which causes pressure on important nerve centres.

The artery which breaks is one which has become worn out and hardened. Apoplexy commonly occurs in those with high blood pressure and whose arteries have lost their elasticity. Occurring early in life, apoplexy may then be considered as the penalty of failure to give reasonable care to the hygienic needs of the body.

Occasionally, death follows upon the apoplectic stroke, but usually consciousness returns, speech is restored, and, to some extent, the paralysis improves. Paralysis which is limited to one side is known as hemiplegia. The face, arm and leg may all be involved, but again, one or other may escape.

At the time of the stroke, the patient should be placed in bed with the head slightly raised and the whole body turned on one side. Alcohol should not be administered; indeed, nothing should be given until the patient is seen by the doctor and then only what the doctor orders. Attempts to make an unconscious person swallow may do harm. An ice-bag or cold compresses may be placed on the head, and a hot water bottle to the feet.

The extent to which recovery is possible depends upon the location and severity of the condition. The blood clots, and the clot contracts and is partially absorbed, thus relieving the pressure. During this convalescent period, passive movements and massage of the paralyzed muscles are considered to be helpful. The value of electrical treatments is questionable. alcohol and overeating should be avoided by those whose condition is such as to predispose to apoplexy. Questions concerning health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College St., Toronto, will be answered personally by letter.
