Death plays strange tricks with human lives. The passing of William G. Cave, founder and for 37 years publisher of the Midland Argus, was marked by one of the oldest coincidences in newspaper history. Just a week ago he sold The Argus to the Midland Free Press, Ltd. and almost at the very moment on Saturday last that the new proprietors were to take possession of the plant, the grim reaper suddenly claimed the soul of Mr. Cave. The last printing job to be done in the office which he loved, and where he had done the major part of his life work, was his own death notice and funeral card. It was a perfect "30" to a long newspaper career.

St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church at Newmarket observed its 104th anniversary on Sunday.

There was a loud knock at the door, and the doctor, who had just settled down for a nap, got up indignantly.

"What is it?" he asked a little boy standing outside.

"I've been bitten by a dog," the lad answered.

"Well, don't you know that my surgery hours are from three to seven?" asked the doctor, crossly.

"Yes," replied the boy sadly. "But the dog didn't."
