YOUR MORNING SPRING OUT OF BED SOON TO BE THE ONLY SPRING IN IT

If you have a comfortable bed purchased B. P. (before priorities), don't just count sheep when you retire tonight — thank your lucky stars for the gentle spring of pre-war steel that shoots your slumber full of ease.

Along with other household refinements of the pre-war era, including refrigerators, vacuum cleaners, washing machines and radios, the steel-spring mattress will be defunct as a manufacturing item on or before September 1st.

Americans have "virtually been lying in a bed of roses" compared with what's on the horizon in the line of mattress comfort, bedding experts say.

In fact, if supplies of mattress materials get much lower, Americans may be reduced to plastic mattresses, tailored to one angle of your silhouette — but the disadvantage of these is that you have to lie in one position all night.

One substitute for the highly-developed ease of springs made of steel, will be good, old reliable felt, which our grandmothers used when the billowy feather bed went out of fashion. There seems to be plenty of felt.

Next in line, experts say, will be cotton fibre, mixed with arlac, a new skimmed milk product.

"America had just reached the peak of sleeping comforts when the war broke out," Norman Dine, "Sleep Shop" manager of Lewis and Conger's store, said. "Now the supplies of good beds are dwindling and despite the ingenuity of manufacturers, beds are getting harder and harder."

Priorities on steel almost immediately doomed the mattress spring, Mr. Dine said. Kapez, an important mattress ingredient, was shut off with the loss of the East Indies. Rubberized hair and rubber sponge mattresses were other war victims. Milkweed seed and cork stuffings are still in the experimental stage.

Upholstery materials, including goose-down and assorted feathers for chairs, sofas and other furniture, are facing an acute shortage.

It may be a long — and hard — war.—Christian Science Monitor.

How Ensilage Functions in Silo

In order to understand why certain precautions are necessary in ensiling legumes, it is useful to know just how the ensilage process functions. When green crops are placed in an air-tight silo under ideal conditions for ensiling, the plants continue to live for a certain length of time. They continue to breathe or respire. This results in the generation of heat and uses up some of the oxygen which is left in the silo mass. Later, while there is still some air left, the activities of the lower forms of life such as moulds, yeasts, and bacteria increase. In good silage, moulds and yeasts function only for a few hours because the oxygen supply is soon exhausted. In very dry crops, more air is present and moulds develop to a greater extent.

Bacteria play an important part in the ensilage process. The desirable types which are found in good silage are capable of living in a limited supply of air. They act on the sugars found in crops and convert them into organic acids such as lactic acid and acetic acid. As these acids develop in sufficient quantity, they in turn destroy the bacteria which produce them or set up conditions in which the bacteria cannot develop. A state of equilibrium is thus reached and the silage will keep in this pickled or preserved state for a considerable length of time. Corn is an ideal medium for the development of the ensilage process because it contains relatively large amounts of sugar for the formation of organic acids. This is why corn has become such a popular silage crop. It can be made into good silage with ordinary care.

But although legumes and young grass are more difficult to ensile because they contain relatively little sugar and are comparatively high in protein, good silage can be made of these crops without the use of preservatives. This fact is particularly important in view of the present impossibility of obtaining molasses on account of the war, and just how this can be done is fully explained in the Special Wartime Series Pamphlet, No. 6, "Making Grass and Legume Silage Without Preservatives". A copy of the pamphlet may be obtained by writing to the Publicity and Extension Division, Dominion Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.
