CHECKING IN HOCKEY | two markers on the ice, about 20 Hockey fans everywhere have feet apart. Then have a line of eard of National League forwards puck carriers go down the ice totho were such goo, checkers in ward him, trying to carry the puck heir time that they were able to past the markers. This drill is all back into defense positions hen they couldn't keep the pace t up front.

Defense conscious players reale now that these position changes vere possible because too many players concentrated on offense, without giving defensive play sufficient practice. It is increasingly difficult now for forwards to move back to the blueline when they begin slowing up.

One example, though, of a player who developed his checking ablity so thoroughly that he extended his career several years is Bill Thoms. He played his major leaque hockey with Toronto Maple Leafs and Boston at center. When he slowed up he dropped back to defense and years later remained in the game by becoming a rearguard in senior amateur competition. At 40 he still is in the game, in a senior league.

Thoms' long career in hockey resulted from his early practice with hook and poke checks. He was so adept years ago he frequenty stopped the great Howie Morenz four times out of five. For you defense-minded hockey players here's how the checks are

The Poke Check: Fake the puck carrier to your shooting side. Spring your trap by bending your knees until you are as close to the ice as possible. Strike toward the puck carrier and shoot out your stick as flat as possible. Catch the puck with your stick, hold it until your opponent has overskated
