Safety Suggestions For A "Merry Firesafe Christmas"

Year after year, the merry Christmas season is overshadowed by tragic fires and loss of life due to careless and improper use of decorations. Christmas, being the festive season that it is, tends to make us forget the ever-present danger of fire in the gay tinsel and glittering lights that decorate our homes.

The Yuletide fire loss statistics for the past number of years form such a consistent pattern that we can almost predict the number of deaths and disastrous fires which will occur this coming season. Sadly enough, helpless children seem to be the most frequent victims, yet the decorations are put up for their particular benefit.

In selecting your tree choose one that is not too large — remember, the larger the tree, the greater the potential hazard. To our knowledge there is no such thing as a fireproof Christmas tree — be wary of such claims by tree sellers. An evergreen tree contains considerable amounts of pitch and resin, both extremely combustible substances, and burns furiously to charred wood in 18 seconds.

Obviously, lighted candles must never be used on Christmas trees, but the electric lights that are recommended in their place are not entirely foolproof, either. These lights must carry the approval label, monogram, or an approval number on the manufacturer's nameplate, of the Canadian Standards Association. Insist upon flame-proof or fire-resistant decorations when buying these items. Remember — light bulbs produce heat — heat produces fire. Keep all bulbs from touching the tree. Turn off the lights before retiring or leaving the house.

Only metal, glass, asbestos or other non-inflammable or flame-proofed decorations should be used to decorate the house and above all, allow no smoking near the Christmas tree. The fireplace must not be overloaded and a substantial screen should be placed in front of the open hearth to prevent the possibility of flying sparks. Each year the death of some good-hearted would-be Santa Claus is recorded because of his costume or simulated beard being set afire. Many of the children's gifts include flimsy paper or cloth costumes, which, when ignited, transform the child into a human torch. Only flame-proofed material should be used in these costumes.

Church candlelight services have ended in funeral services in past instances. Safety battery candles, if used in this type of service, are just as effective and are safer than open-flame candles.

At this time of year, there is an ever-increasing tendency for unthinking parents to leave children alone or improperly attended while visiting relatives, friends, and, quite often, drinking establishments. In addition to the moral obligation of parents to protect their offspring, they can be charged under the Criminal Code for failing to provide proper protection for their children.

The use of baby-sitters introduces other serious problems. Many baby-sitters do not even know the address of the home in which they are minding the children, and could not give the correct address to the fire department should a fire occur. It must also be remembered that a baby-sitter is not as familiar with a house as those who live in it. Any outside person given the responsibility of the children while the parents are out should be carefully briefed as to location of exits and the telephone, the fire department telephone number and the address and telephone number of the place to which the parents are going. These instructions should be in writing as well as verbal.
