Let's talk REAL ESTATE
by Thomas Oakley
The other day I came across a digest of a speech by a prominent real estate expert who listed three reliable rules for all buyers to follow.
First of all, he said, you should figure out the overhead expense on your house will cost you about a dollar a month for every $100 of the house's value. For example, a $12,000 house would cost $120 a month to operate, so if you couldn't afford to pay that much every month, you should look for a house that is correspondingly less expensive.
Secondly, he said, the most anyone should pay for a house is an amount equal to 2 1/2 times his annual income. That may sound pretty low to many people with moderate incomes who have priced houses today and found that while prices are high, down payments are low; but don't forget that the high-priced house, even with a low down payment, is still subject to the overhead expenses mentioned in the first rule above.
His third rule is to allocate a week's salary per month to the financing and maintenance of your home, which, again, is a good rule if we can assume that your income over the last few years has kept pace with the prices of goods and labor generally. People whose incomes are lower than average will probably find - or have likely found already - that they must allocate somewhat more than a week's pay a month to maintain even a modest home of their own.
Once again, I want to emphasize that I'm not trying to discourage my readers from buying homes of their own - far from it. But no conscientious broker likes to see the head of any family take on more financial responsibilities than he can handle.
