CARS ARE MY LINE

By Bud Lauria

Friends sometimes complain to me that their car brakes act up when they first start out for work, but then get better through the day.

This kind of "morning sickness" can be mighty puzzling, but there's a sure way of curing it.

The cause is moisture and the way to get rid of it is to put the brakes on lightly for a few seconds as the car starts to roll away.

There's one thing about brake trouble, though, it usually gives plenty of warning that something is wrong, either by noise, or fading or grabbing.

The real enemy of brakes is heat. That's why you should try to stop the car by short off-and-on application of the brake pedal. Jamming on the brakes and leaving them there raises the temperature of the brake drums and lining by — literally — hundreds of degrees.

When a serviceman recommends new brake linings it's something you should never put off. Brake drums that are scored are so much more expensive to replace than brake linings.

And the piece of mind that comes from knowing there are good breaks ready to pull you up is a great safety factor.

When you're shopping around for a used car, take one of ours that pressures you out for a spin and test the brakes against the stopping-distance charts that you can pick up from safety organizations. Before a car goes out on the lot, we make sure the brakes are in safety-shape.
