There was a whir in the air like the soft swoosh of a taffeta petticoat under a party dress. I gazed heavenward and saw the first spring migration, in our part of the country of Canada geese on the wing northward. Then a crow came into sight flapping and cawing across the sky, apparently announcing it was time to hunt pussy willows in the swamp. Great drifts of snow were disintegrating rapidly into little rivulets and hurrying across fields to join the spring-fed creek on the edge of our eight acres. As I watched from my picture window buds on the apple trees seemed to grow fatter and fatter in the warmth of the sun's rays.

It happens this way every spring. I get soaked hip high wading through melting drifts to cut the first bright red dogwood twigs and yellow will stems in our low lands. These I gaily add to the forsythia I have already forced along with branches of apple blossoms in the old butter crock by the livingroom fireplace. I can never wait for spring to happen; I must always go out to meet it coming along our country road.

This season of the year quite often presents a hazard in our house. It shows up all the defects in walls and furniture and too often inspires me to tackle jobs that exceed my strength or capability. I never seem to learn my lesson; I just go on being a sucker for punishment year after year.

This time it was the wide crack in the ceiling where the February blizzard leaked persistently for hours, that caused my stiff neck, twisted shoulder ligaments, ten broken finger nails and a bruised spirit. I was no thing but a bundle of strained muscles merely hours after I decided to stucco the ceiling to cover up the damage.

Some chap in a grey flannel suit had written such convincing advertising copy I was easily sold on the simplicity of mixing an innocuous looking white powder with sufficient water to make a smooth paste and "then apply to the clean surface with a sponge". There was nothing in these directions about first taking Judo lessons to prepare one for wrestling with step ladder and implements, or mention made of the fact that doing a Michelangelo stunt could tie one in a knot like a pretzel.

Actually, I got so adept after my first struggle to attach mush to plaster and make it stick that I could cover the odd square foot without having a single gob splat on my forehead, or obliterate my eyesight entirely with a wet poultice. The worst part of the operation was the anticipation that, after the stucco hardened, the ceiling still had to have a coat of paint.

It was then I literally threw in the sponge. I could wipe off a glob of crack filler, but my dignity really suffered when a steady stream of off-white paint started slithering from the brush down my forearm to elbow and my right shoulder seemed permanently separated from its socket.

I have a wonderful panacea for this type of selfinflicted torture. I closed the front door behind me, dropped the key in my pocket and headed for our railway station. I had a sudden yen to ride a commuter train and see how Canada's publicly owned railroad, the CNR, takes care of literally thousands of people who ride the rails every business work day.

When my train pulled into the Union Station in Toronto I queued up before heavy steel gates with several hundred kerchiefed young girls. There were also executive types with brief cases dangling from their right hands, while they tried to read headlines in carefully folded newspapers. My enthusiasm for a 40-mile ride west, close to the shores of Lake Ontario, was very real to me but obviously routine to these blase humans. If Canadians are as gregarious as they are purported to be, you'd never guess it from watching a trainload of commuters. Not a word was spoken, nor a friendly nod exchanged among these people who see each other five days a week.

Kambling Around by Elizabeth Kelson

The tennis season is here again. Join your local tennis club or renew your membership, whatever the case may be. Then get those racquets out of the cupboard and gather up your old tennis balls. They'll be plenty good enough for the first few practices.

Tennis is the most valuable sport you can learn. It is valuable because it is an individual sport and is more easily carried on in adult life than team sport which takes considerable effort to organize in the press of the business and professional worlds. Tennis because of small requirements of time and playing space, and its comparatively inexpensive equipment make it an ideal sport for almost any age group and also for those of different income levels.

Certainly the greatest benefit that tennis gives its followers is the means to keep physically fit. It helps to increase powers of co-ordination and alertness. It aids in making a more graceful looking body. I believe that all young people should be encouraged to play tennis. I would like to see tennis included on the sports programmes of all high schools. They should be taught at least the basic fundamentals of the game. Who knows, one of them might go on to be champion in their area or province.

Most of the famous tennis players have played tennis from a very early age. Bill Tilden said he started to play at the age of six. The late King Gustav of Sweden played the game until well on into the eighties. Tennis is a game that can be carried along with practically any form of endeavour. Business people, doctors, nurses, lawyers, teachers and housewives can if they desire find enough leisure time to play and by so doing increase their productivity by better physcial condition. There is no need for older people to make a strenuous game out of tennis. A game of doubles can result in a lot of fun without demanding too much over exertion.

One of the saddest things that can happen to a community is to allow their tennis courts to deteriorate because of apathy and lack of interest on the part of its members. There is nothing that adds more to a community than to have tennis courts that are being constantly used by its members. It is a pleasure to watch them playing, garbed of course, in the traditional whites. Do not allow tennis to die out from lack of interest. Keep teaching the young to play as they are the future adults who will keep this great game alive. Tennis,
