Character In Writing (6)
Self-Consciousness Humour In Your Pen

By Alex Sjoberg (CGA - IGAS)

We have been asked to point out HUMOUR and to expand on SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS, so in this article we are going to deal with those traits. Study this writing, that of a very nice person indeed who has a well developed social consciousness and reveals generosity in her services on behalf of others.

How I love to write and read, but I'm confident this to give for they that I'm crazy

Note how she makes the initial stroke of the capital H in the word 'How'. This means she has a good sense of humour. She appreciates the funny or amusing side of life. At the same time, notice how the final peak of each 'n' in the words 'and', 'confide', 'think', 'friends' is higher than the preceding one. This type of 'n' (or 'm') means self-consciousness. Actually, you know, self-consciousness is a fear of making mistakes. When the trait is pronounced, along with other negative characteristics, it will be a hindrance, because one cannot do his best when he is wondering what the next person thinks about his appearance or work or general attitude, or worrying about being criticized. Self-consciousness is a form of nervousness in which the individual is more conscious of himself than his surroundings. Basically, self-consciousness is determined by a lack of understanding of others.

The woman who wrote these lines has an excellent sense of her self-consciousness. She is largely curing herself of this trait because she takes a genuine interest in others. She watches others, learns about their likes and dislikes, their dreams and afflictions. It is pretty difficult to think about yourself and others at the same time. So if YOU are self-conscious, take an interest in others. It works!

Humour

Humour itself is something we can study for an entire lifetime. We know as little about the whys of humour as we do about the spark of life itself, or man's creativity. Of course we know a great deal about humour's outward forms. We know that it helps us relieve tensions in laughter (why do you suppose a top comedian is paid such staggering sums?)

We know that humour can create, reform and progress; that it can hold hard pressed armies and nations together; that it can break down barriers and build intimate contact. We know that dictators rarely have a sense of humour, indicating a degree of immaturity. We know that cruel humour can reflect sadism. It is said too that there is nothing quite as elusive as the essence of comedy. Producing laughter is an indefinite science which can never be wholly accurate since people's reactions to what they feel to be funny differs so widely. But we think it is correct to say that so long as a person has a sense of humour he is not without hope, no matter what his predicament is or fault may be, because a sense of humour makes him approachable.

G. A. ANSWER BOX

ABE: The more you tell a grapho analyst (or a doctor or lawyer) about yourself, the more he can help you. He isn't a magician. *****

KERRY: You'll spend on others first and yourself last because you're a philosopher, unafraid, interested in ideas rather than material possessions. *****

CUTENESS: Your friend is easily hurt but also broadminded. He will give you a hearing. Apologize for your sharp tongue. You will too, because there's good stuff in you. *****

HB: Self-confidence comes with knowledge, understanding of self, enabling one to study mistakes objectively. *****
