MORE REASONS WHY NORTHLAND LURES

Famous fishing lakes in northern Ontario bush country look like green tea that has been steeped for centuries. Calm, dark, sometimes shading almost to ebony in their great depth, their shorelines drop invariably from tree-line to the burial ground of old trees time and weather have cast beneath the water's edge.

When I peered over the side of the boat to see the bottom of Shoo Fly Lake, I realized only a native bushman could find the underwater gardens where water carrot grow. This is a favorite fodder of moose, whose herds are increasing in the hunting areas north of Capreol, Ontario. Pete Chenier, my guide during a recent fishing adventure, found one of these gardens for me. It was in a sandy bay and because I asked what the peculiar looking objects were, seen floating on the water like dead fish, bellies up, Pete jockeyed the boat nearer shore. He explained, last year's growth that was not devoured by moose floats to the surface when the new crop germinates.

Pete's nature lore was fascinating. While we trolled the bays and inlets he taught me how to recognize a "live" beaver house and those that had been abandoned. My city eyes were soon able to spot beaver slides, which are paths worn through the woods to the water's edge, where these industrious small animals haul the poplars they fell for eating and construction. I learned about the banker beaver too, one of nature's renegades, who finds a hole in the lake's bank and subsists on the bark from poplar logs that drift by. These lazy types never make any effort to joint a house, or do their stint of building.

Rain, which came down in spasmodic deluges, could not dampen our fishing ardor. Before we left shore, Pete found a pail of plastic pants in the truck and offered them to me to pull over my slacks. They were about as manageable as a bowlful of jello on the edge of a volcano. Everytime I moved from boat to shore they would slip to half mast, get tangled with pole and paddle and send Pete into hysterics.

Most of the time I sat in the prow of the boat in ecstatic misery with small rivulets running off my slicker hood into the tops of my fancy shoes, my line trailing far behind the boat with a lure attached which apparently no fish could resist. With beginner's luck I got more nibbles than a penny stock salesman, but womanlike, I wished I had swallowed hooks with my lunch every time Pete removed the lure from a catch with a pair of pliers. I shuddered with unsportsmanlike anguish when he hooked the fish through the gills and hung it over the side of the boat on a chain.

Pete assured me I would eventually become accustomed to it. Sure enough, the fascination of waiting for that tug on my line was soon greater than my dreaded anticipation of having to land a flipping, flopping, slithery hunk of fish flesh.

Indian Fire Best

Pete Chenier's eyes know the portent of every cloud. A drizzle can be endured, but when I heard Pete say, "Reel in fast", I knew we were headed for the biggest spruce tree on shore to seek shelter from a downpour. Peeling soggy bark from a dead birch, he quoted Canada's first citizens, "White man build big fire, burn face - freeze backside; Indian build little fire, soon warm all through."

My woodsman guide knows the danger of fire in the bush. He saw Shoo Fly Lake burned over in 1941. Each time we had to take shelter ashore to dry out our sodden selves, he took pains when the skies cleared to scatter the fire, douse it with water and wait until the last ember had died. Pete reveres the privilege of fishing and hunting in this northland country. He never misses an opportunity to impress anglers and hunters with the hazard of fire.

Canada's Isolationists

These northern camp operators I wager, are the only Canadian taxpayers who are not clamoring for bigger and better road systems. They are content to drive the lumber tote roads that lace the bush and would jar the molars out of a brass monkey. When they want access to a lake by a new route, they commandeer the help of native Indians and blaze a new trail. A northern bushman knows every pot hole on these wooded roads. In the spring when trucks that take anglers from one lake to another get mired they calmly cut down a few poplars, Jack up their vehicle to bridge the muck and are soon on their way.

"The CN transcontinental line is all the transportation we need. It brings in our supplies, our guests and their gear," said Mary Chenier, who is the only woman camp owner I could discover in that region. "Our business would soon be ruined if good roads made it possible to gain easy access by car to these lakes. Earnest anglers and hunters are only satisfied when they can get away from civilization and wrestle with nature." If you could roll all the old cliches such as "last frontier, new horizons and pioneer spirit" into one, you would have a pretty accurate picture of Mary Chenier and her railway-foreman husband, Pete, their characteristics and life in the backwoods. Though the opportunity has presented itself for them to live all year round in the settled railway junction community of Capreol, Mary's love of the bush country is only satisfied when she is coping with encroaching nature.

Some years ago, when Pete was transferred as a section foreman from Felix to Capreol, they sold their camp at Shoo Fly Lake. Mary, who can fell trees, shoot like a man, bake bread and churn butter, hungered for the woods where she had learned to survive by her wits. That is why Chenier's Camp came into existence. While Pete continues with his railway job, only guiding on his days off, Mary runs the camp.

I could understand a little how she felt when I stood in that vast cathedral of trees and sky listening to the stir of wild life and learning something of the excitement of the kill, whether it be fish, fowl or bigger game. Mary is content that the only evidence of modern civilization in her woodsy world is a flag stop on a through
