

They Love Valley Park

LARGE-MOUTHED BASS CAUGHT IN POND

ENJOYING THE WATER AT VALLEY PARK

BY MRS. LOREN GUILD
Headford Correspondent

Most farmers realize that a pond is a good investment, but Stewart and Jean Rumble decided that a pond was good fun as well.

The parents and children of Headford agree, for within walking distance they have resort facilities.

On any fine day shouts and splashing can be heard floating up from Valley Park Farm as the young and not so young take to the water. "Last one in is a ---". The final term lost in a chorus of splashes.

The pond, like topsy, just grew. From a small creek flowing quietly below their home, quiet until in the spring it rose and caused erosion problems.

It had to be diverted and in so doing a pool was formed large enough for the family to enjoy. Then it seemed to the Rumbles that the pond could be improved.

This is a motivating influence in their lives; that anything can be made better and that obstacles are something that can be put to use. They believe in using what is at hand.

Farmers learn to be patient and the Rumbles are farmers. "Dirt Farmers" is the title Stewart used to describe his status.

"The term," he explained, "designates the difference between a farmer who does his own work and a hobby farmer who employs someone else to run his farm."

And so, with farm activities and many outside interests, they worked slowly within the farmer's calendar of time and season, and gradually made a park in the valley that was once just a scrubby piece of pasture.

This is a perfect spot for picnics; no windows to get in the way of a ball player's best effort, the water deep enough to swim in but not too deep, a boat to drift about in, a ball diamond, picnic tables, shady spots in which to rest and, an added delight, quiet safe seclusion.

Inevitably and for several reasons it became necessary to make a small charge for admittance. The local people have swimming privileges in the morning and local picnics are held there as well as ball games.

There is another angle of interest to the pond. In 1959 the Municipal Metro Conservation Authority stocked the pond with 50 large-mouthed bass fingerlings approximately two to three inches long.

A year later the bass were nine inches long and doing well. In 1961 they ran 11 to 14 inches.

Bass spawn at the age of two years and in June they showed good growth. This is a control pond and fishing is not open to the public.

Conservation, says the Metro authority, is the wise use without waste of natural resources. That seems to be the rule the Rumbles have applied through the seven to eight year gradual development of the valley.
