Donald Martyn, Progressive Conservative candidate for York North in the November 8 federal election, was guest of honor at five coffee parties in the village, on October 29. These parties were scheduled one after the other throughout the day and Mr. Martyn and his group were led from one to the other by the strains of the bagpipe. Here each of the candidates spoke to the assembled members, Mr. and Mrs. George Sanderson of Sherwood Manor then held a reception for Mr. Martyn on the same evening which was attended by over 100 people.

It was reported here in error last week that the TV set which Doug Lighthouse is enjoying so much during his convalescence at Toronto General Hospital, was provided by the Maple Lions Club.

This was not correct, as the TV set has been very kindly provided by a family friend, Mrs. Ronald Lord. We regret this error and apologize to Mrs. Lord.

St. Stephen's Anglican Young People held their very successful Hobo Hop on Halloween night in the parish hall of the church. The members had the hall beautifully decorated and all were dressed in the prescribed hard-times costumes. Entertaining at the dance were the "Younger Generation" that local group of folk singers, whose members are Doug James, Shelly James, Linda Graham and Blake McMaster.

It is believed that the United Church of Canada took over on union, the Wesleyan Methodist Church but the United Church denies any claim to the property.

J. R. Strathy, owner of lands surrounding the cemetery is seeking to arrange conveyance of the land to him, subject to the provisions of the Cemeteries Act, Section 60 of this act provides that where the owner of a cemetery cannot be found the council of the local municipality shall be deemed the owner. ## Mother Presents Brief To Gov't C'tee

By MARGARET McLEAN

Where do you go for help for an emotionally disturbed child?

Mrs. T. A. Torrance of Maple finally went to the Ontario Legislature and last week presented a brief to the Select Committee on Youth which has been conducting hearings in various parts of the province for the last year.

Mrs. Torrance complained to the committee of a "woeful lack of facilities" for the treatment of disturbed children. During the years from age 7 to 15, her child was seen by private psychiatrists, child guidance clinics and psychologists, all of whom agreed she "had a problem" but none of whom offered treatment or advice to the parents on how to cope with the situation.

Finally, a medical doctor with a strong interest in mental health told the family of Warrendale, a residential treatment centre for disturbed children at Oak Ridges and the youngster was admitted there after years of heart-breaking trouble at elementary and secondary schools. After less than two years at Warrendale the teenager is back at home, able to hold a job. Regular out-patient care continues and the whole family is benefitting through counselling.

"This kind of total approach," Mrs. Torrance told the committee, "is well worthy of public support and more official recognition."

While urging more centres like Warrendale instead of enormous and overcrowded institutions such as the Ontario Hospital School at Smith's Falls, Mrs. Torrance stressed that preventive measures were urgently needed.

"There must be education for family living through the schools, to teach people awareness of their responsibilities to their children and themselves," said her brief. "Parenting is an art which can be taught and it must be learned by those who intend to embark on its sometimes stormy seas. We can no longer afford the cost of leaving it to instinct," she said. "We must teach the growth and development of human beings all along the line."

Quoting the Canadian Mental Health Association's description of the tide of mental illness as "the quiet disaster", she urged that action be taken now to control it. Chief among her prescriptions is more teacher training to aid in the recognition of emotional disturbance in children while a course on the identification and help of emotionally disturbed children is offered at Toronto Teachers' College, Mrs. Torrance feels strongly that it should be compulsory and not just an option as at present.

At the same time, she feels that primary teachers should be the most highly qualified, rather than the least qualified as is presently the case, as early identification of disturbance is most important.

Parents must be included in the total approach, Mrs. Torrance told "The Liberal". "There is too much skirting around. Parents often don't wish to recognize or accept difference in a child." They must be helped to become aware, she said, because if emotional disturbance is not caught early it can become a long term case and bring untold heartache to both parents and child. However, Mrs. Torrance stressed that mental retardation and emotional disturbance should not be classed together, although they can exist in the same child. How to avoid emotional disturbance and how to recognize it should be taught. "When you face a hard reality, half the battle is won," she said. "Such acceptance is mandatory before the child or the parents can be helped."

Specific recommendations which Mrs. Torrance made to the committee included: that the province assume total financial responsibility for the care of disturbed children; that doctors, health nurses and teachers be included along with social workers in the treatment team; that school boards pay the cost of school fees if the child must leave his own community for treatment; that existing facilities be expanded, with more residential treatment centres; that primary grades be limited to not more than 25 pupils; that a Department of Youth be set up to co-ordinate all youth services so no child is overlooked, whatever his problems or resources.

Mrs. Torrance also assisted in the preparation of a brief which was presented by the Ontario Association for Emotionally Disturbed Children to Ontario Premier John Robarts and his cabinet earlier this year. This brief included several pathetic case histories underlining the heartbreaking conditions created by lack of assistance for emotionally disturbed children, by lack of recognition of their needs, and compounding of their problems when they are mistakenly admitted to reform institutions and those intended for the mentally retarded.

On reading a column by Lotta Dempsey in the Toronto Star last summer, entitled "And Nobody Waved Goodbye", Mrs. Torrance herself became the subject of a further column entitled "She Waves Hello". The first column was an account by a visitor to the summer camp operated by Warrendale who had said that most of the children at the camp had never known love and acceptance and that a real home was unknown to some of them; that when they went to camp "nobody waved goodbye".

"I'm one of the mothers who didn't wave goodbye," said Mrs. Torrance. "I was too heartbroken." Many of the parents were defeated and heart-wary when they found Warrendale, she said, they were parents who cared enormously but had made mistakes and had nowhere to turn.

The whole family has benefited from Warrendale, reports Mrs. Torrance. Following counselling, both she and her husband were given IQ tests at the County Hospital, Newmarket. When these revealed very high potential (aptitude tests showed both would have made good physicians) they enrolled in night classes at Atkinson College of York University. Mrs. Torrance hopes to be able to work in the behavioral sciences herself someday and actively help troubled young people.

In reply to the Scriptural question "Am I my brother's keeper", Mrs. Torrance answers in her brief, "In view of my own experience, acquired insight and personal involvement I must say, unequivocally, 'Yes'." To which nothing can be more fittingly added than "Amen".
