Due to the Christmas Holidays there is no action to report from the high school front, however. Chip Martin once again saves the day.

This being basketball season, I wonder how many of you actually know how the game orig-

The first game of basketball was played in December of 1891 in Springfield, Massachusetts. The game was introduced in France, England, Australia and Canada within three years but basketball did not gain international favor until it was added to the Olympic games in 1936.

James Naismith, a Canadian from Almonte in Eastern Ontario and boyhood chum of Tait McKenzie originally conceived the game while attending a YMCA training school in Springfield. The students from this school were to become athletic directors in YMCA's around the world. These students, however, disliked the rigorous course of Swedish and German calisthenics, so the head of the physical education department asked his students to devise a game that would fill the void between football and baseball seasons

Naismith originally devised basketball with 13 rules, five of which still hold true today:

(1) The ball must be large, light, and easily handled. (2) The ball may not be advanced by running. (3) There must be no restriction upon a player getting the ball at any time. (4) Bodily contact is not permissible.

(5) Goals must be horizonal and elevated. Naismith's class was comprised of 19 students so two teams of eight were made. For nets, peach baskets which had been found in the basement of the school were used. These "nets" were nailed to a balcony railing which happened to be 10 feet above the floor. Although the original play was inept, the game was an instantaneous success with requests for the rules coming from all over.

Chip Martin's Column

Unfortunately, five years later basketball became less popular for two main reasons. The first reason was that the game restricted the use of YMCA halls to only eighteen people for prolonged periods of time and that the game had become excessively rough. As a result of the Y's condemnation of the sport many youths dropped their memberships in favor of starting teams in dance halls where admission was charged to pay for the halls, and hence, professional teams began to operate.

In the earliest days of basketball a soccer ball was used and by 1894 a slightly larger laced ball was introduced. In 1937 the laceless ball was adopted and in 1941 the present day molded ball was employed. In 1893 peach baskets were discarded and a hammock-type basket was used. If a player scored, someone would have to climb up a ladder to retrieve the ball, or else a long pole was used to knock the ball out. Still later, a device using a chain was adopted, so that if someone pulled the chain the ball would be ejected.

It remained for the professional teams to cut a hole in the netting to let the ball fall through (nice thinking fellas!).

In the very early years of the game balcony spectators sat behind the baskets and would direct shots towards or away from the baskets depending where their loyalties lay. In 1895 a wire screen was used but these became dented making them unreliable and tricky. Finally wooden backboards were developed and today glass and metal are also widely used.

More changes for the future? Mebbe. Experiments with a twelve foot high basket (at present height is 10') have been carried out in U.S. universities. The advantage of this is that the game would no longer depend on tall giants to score points. Many of the seven-footers can stuff baskets with little difficulty. The raised baskets would again place emphasis on shooting and height would no longer be a factor, thereby giving the shorter man a chance. The only problem with the scheme is that coaches who have taller players on their teams are against it for obvious reasons.

Basketball is extremely popular in the United States where over 140,000,000 spectators annually attend games. Of that total 100,000,000 watch high school games. I was unable to locate any Canadian figures but I have a sneaking suspicion that the number of spectators is somewhat less. Come on Canadians, you're not trying!
