MEXICO CITY

Anywhere you go in Mexico, you will see little roadmarkers each bearing a number and nothing else. They indicate the number of miles you are from Mexico City, the heart of Mexico. It is the country's true center, politically, culturally and emotionally. What most people don't realize until they have been there, is that Mexico City is not only the oldest city in the Western Hemisphere, but one of the biggest in the world. With a population of just over 8.5 million, it is surpassed only by Tokyo, London, New York, Shanghai and Moscow.

It is this combination of age and size that makes it such a fascinating place. You can step out into the street from the most luxurious of modern hotels and in five minutes be in a quarter of the city where most of the buildings are hundreds of years old. You can spend the morning shopping at a department store the equal of anything in New York, London or Paris and later in the day visit a street market where goods are brought in by man on burro and sold in the same way they have since before the Spanish came to conquer in the 16th century.
