Marsh World
POWDER DOWN - Most Birds provide a waterproof dressing for feathers by distributing oil from the "preening gland" during the preening process. Herons (including the bitterns) have an additional waterproofing technique. Modified down feathers on the breast and belly grow continuously, but rapidly break up into microscopic fragments known as "powder down." This powder, which superficially resembles graphite, is distributed over the feather surfaces, giving a dusty, waterproof "bloom" to the plumage.
