Questions McMurtry on violence in minors

KING CITY — Why are professional hockey players prosecuted for assault while charges are not laid in violent amateur and minor league games, Murray Sheardown asked Ontario Attorney-General Roy McMurtry last week.

Sheardown said the professionals were "paid actors," doing what they were paid to do.

The attorney-general said there had been prosecutions in Ontario Hockey Association games and police had been asked to watch the games. He was answering questions at the York North Progressive Conservative Association annual meeting.

He played industrial hockey himself until he was 35. "There were some nights when the whole bunch of us should have been in the cooler."

The actions of professionals are seen on television. Last year, after a particularly wild Philadelphia-Toronto clash, there was a game in a community in the far north the next day which got out of hand.

One boy went home afterwards, got a gun and shot one of his opponents, McMurtry said.

"Some Philadelphia players have told me privately that they use bullying tactics," he went on. "They figure it is worth a goal a game against some teams."

He felt the NHL scene was improving as indicated by Philadelphia trading some of its rougher players.
