But, where is he?

Sheldrake files election costs

No one seems to know where Doug Sheldrake is, but he's apparently keeping in touch.

Yesterday, a letter arrived at the Town Office which claimed Mr. Sheldrake spent $500 to run his campaign in the last municipal election when he sought a regional council seat in Richmond Hill.

Assistant Town Clerk Bob Panizza said the Sheldrake signature was authentic.

The letter arrived a day after Mr. Panizza said Mr. Sheldrake would have until Friday to present a statement of campaign contributions and expenses.

Mr. Panizza suggested Monday

the Town would likely prosecute if Mr. Sheldrake had failed to comply with its demands.

The letter, however, let's Mr. Sheldrake off the hook.

As far as the town is concerned, Enter York Regional Police.

Deputy Chief Wallace Harkness still wants Mr. Sheldrake to testify at a hearing next week, which has been set up as a result of Mr. Sheldrake's allegations against York Regional Police last summer.

The hearing begins in Toronto February 12, and yesterday Deputy Harkness was still looking.

These employees having problems crossing street

The Town of Richmond Hill, the Region of York and the York Regional Police force will soon be co-ordinated to help mentally retarded adults make it safely to work each day.

Executive Director of York Central Association for the Mentally Retarded, Sil Steffan, asked the town to look into a situation involving heavy traffic conditions on Elgin Mills Road at Edward Street.

Workers trying to reach Arc Industries, the sheltered workshop for mentally retarded adults on Edward Street have been experiencing difficulties crossing the busy street.

Mr. Steffan asked for some type of crosswalk or stop light to be placed at the intersection.

Town representatives took the problem to the region as Elgin Mills is a regional road and last Thursday morning, Councillor Lou Wainwright, a member of the regional engineering committee, advised the town's committee that the region will include improvements in this area in their budget.
