St. Mark's Gospel and the Cross

By The Rev. H.B. BARRETT
St. Mary's Anglican Church

In this first week of Lent, I would like to think with you a little bit about St. Mark's understanding of the Cross. St. Mark's Gospel was probably the first one to be written and is the shortest and, in many ways, the most direct of the Gospels. St. Mark gives a picture of Jesus as the strong Son of God in the world to proclaim the good news of the establishment of God's Kingdom in the world.

Jesus goes about healing, teaching, sharing with people and, in such a way, brings the reality of the Kingdom of God to bear on people's lives.

Gradually though, St. Mark begins to show us that Jesus knows that the way of fullest giving, sharing and ministering will lead to death on the Cross.

Accordingly, in St. Mark, Chapter 8, vs. 31, Chapter 9, vs. 31 and Chapter 10, vs. 33, we see Jesus showing that love will ultimately be expressed through the Cross.

The disciples and others around Jesus cannot understand this at first.

But as St. Mark unfolds the story of the crucifixion in very stark and simple terms, we see that St. Mark presents us with the great reality that God's love is given to the world by the strong Son of God entering into all the agony of man's life, sharing it and suffering on the cross that man could be brought back into a new relationship with God. May I suggest that it would be worth sitting down and reading this short Gospel from beginning to end again but if there isn't time to do this, at least read the last part of the Gospel, from Chapter 8 on, which I think will be more beneficial than reading this article.
