

Church column

By REV. MORAR MURRAY-HAYES

Another election is over. Some of us are relieved; some of us are resigned; and now, we think, we can get back to "the important things in life".

And yet, even after an election, we are still each of us involved in the decisions of government — especially a minority government, which is likely to be especially sensitive to public opinion.

How do we decide what we want our government to do? Many want it to do whatever will benefit their own private interests. And politicians cater to that thinking.

Most of the issues in the recent election addressed the public's sense of greed. All the parties seemed to be saying, "The basket of goodies which we offer is your best buy."

As the religion editor of the Toronto Star wrote: "People are wooed not on the basis of any lasting principles but on the expediency of apparent short-term gains — which will ultimately prove to have been illusory."

The Church offers an alternative approach to government, for it is called to transcend the private interests of any one person or any one class.

The New Testament proclaims that God's love has exploded beyond national boundaries. The disciples of Christ are called to witness the love of God all over the world. Jesus' story of the Samaritan who helped the Jew in need, even though the Samaritan and Jewish nations had poor foreign relations with each other, points out that to love our neighbor means much more than loving our fellow nationals. The Church therefore calls us to care for the world in concrete ways, even if that entails personal sacrifices.

We should think twice about building up the Canadian economy if that is going to mean erecting tariff barriers against developing nations and reducing foreign aid.

We should think twice about making Canada self-sufficient in energy if that is just a means to isolating Canada from the needs of the rest of the world and a means to continue using fuel rashly.

We should think twice about concentrating on Canadian issues if it means ignoring the starving, the victims of disasters, the refugees, the prisoners of conscience.

Do we give a damn? We do. In "Justice Not Charity", Doug Roche, an active Christian and a Conservative MP from Edmonton, lists 45 things an individual can do to incarnate our love for our neighbors in developing nations.

But one important immediate way is to let your own MP know that we are not merely interested in acquiring more for ourselves, but that we care for our world.

Think twice about building Canadian economy
