and displays was in Greek then English. Seldom if ever did any other language appear. I remarked on this to a guide in a museum who replied "Why are you surprised? English is now the world language." He continued. "We went through periods when French and German were prominent but now it's English."

The difficulty I suppose will be the loss to the tourist, who doesn't try to master at least a few words of the native language, of a feeling that you are part of the country during your visit. You will miss the smile from the person when you say something in their language or the laughter when they respond to you by saying - my English is not good, but it's better than your Greek.

If, however, we can develop a process where we can communicate easily with each other perhaps good communication will lead to better understanding and better relationships between nations as well as individuals. On the other hand it could lead to everyone acting like the masses of Babel and building fantasy castles in the air!
