voluntary standards.

An estimated 70 per cent of groceries contain genetically modified ingredients. But there's no law requiring grocers to say so unless there is a clear health hazard.

Brent Patterson, of the Council of Canadians, says all consumers can do is check out the ingredients and play a guessing game.

But if an organic producer wants to label a product GMO-free, most major food retailers in the country have decided they won't allow it.

About 50 organizations are in the middle of drafting voluntary standards for labelling and until they finish the job they say no label is a good label.

The Consumers' Association of Canada agrees. Spokesperson Jenny Hillard says people have been misled by slack labelling laws before.

Because GMO-free products cost more, Hillard says it leaves a lot of room for rip-offs. "We got misleading environmental labels all over the marketplace. In the late '80s and early '90s and now, we're still not able to either persuade manufacturers to use, or consumers to believe, a standardized set of labels."

But the Council of Canadians says large grocery chains should start by labelling the food they know has genetically modified ingredients.
