

Joseph Brant's position of leadership was not an inherited one. When the Six Nations was formed the government of the league was placed in the hands of fifty sachems, divided among the members. These positions became hereditary and were passed through the female line. Brant's mother was not of this aristocracy and as a result, he had to achieve his status as a leader by his military exploits and by promoting the public good of his people.