

National training program to maximize billions of dollars of Aboriginal trust funds

The National Aboriginal Trust Officers Association (NATOA) announced April 27th a partnership with TD Bank Financial Group (TD), Indian and Northern Affairs Canada (INAC) and Lethbridge College to create an online National Aboriginal Trustee Accreditation Program. The program is intended to deliver standardized training based on Canadian trustee best-practices to enhance Aboriginal fund management across the country. With billions of dollars under management in Canada, the opportunity to create a positive economic and social impact on Aboriginal communities is substantial.

"Responsibly managing and maximizing investments is critical to the economic and social well-being of Aboriginal communities," says NATOA chair Wyatt Arcand. A not-for-profit association, NATOA's participation in the partnership will further its mandate to assist Aboriginal communities in becoming self-sustaining and vital economic entities. "This partnership and the resulting program will provide all Aboriginal communities with equal access to education and opportunities for enhanced fund management."

TD is a major sponsor of NATOA and recognizes the need for enhanced trustee and trust management knowledge. "We are thrilled to be funding this initiative as we have been providing Aboriginal trust guidance for quite some time," says Domenic Natale, vice-president of Aboriginal Trust Services for TD Waterhouse. "A training program serves to put participants on a level playing field when it comes to dealing with trusts and will make a significant positive impact on the Aboriginal community in Canada."

Indian and Northern Affairs Canada provided funding for this project through its Community Support Services Program, which offers assistance for projects that deliver support services
