BLIGHTY, SWEET BLIGHTY!

(From The Sketch) Tommy (home on leave after fifteen months in the trenches, and ready to praise all familiar things)— "Hey, Jimmy! Don't the gas-works smell lovely?" Australia boasts of the tallest trees grown on British soil. In Cuba tobacco is planted, grown and gathered in ninety days. California is about to irrigate 1,000,000 acres in San Joaquin valley.

GOLD BOUND A STORY OF ALASKAN GOLD COUNTRY

(Continued from last week) but I'll bet they remember, and will be sorry I ain't there." There was a suspicion of a tear in his eye. "We've got the one thing we can't buy outside this snowed-in jail—a Santa Claus who doesn't need a make-up," said Duceane cheerfully. "But we ain't got the other thing that makes Santa Claus worth while" put in John Brown, who was thinking of his own family. "I mean the little shavers." Duceane gestured toward the half-circle of Eskimo. "They'll fill the want," he declared. "They're only grown-up children. Let's give them a real Christmas tree, presents, candy, and all the trimmings." "You can't get any hooch into this booby hatch," objected the fifth member of the semi-circle, who was in the toils for selling that same hooch liquor to the natives. "You're certainly an iconoclast, friend," chided Duceane, gently. The word was not in the whisky-smuggler's vocabulary, but he stood repressed. "We don't need any mistletoe," said Skookum, with a trace of bitterness, but he began to write out an order on the jailer for a suitable draft upon the funds he had in the safe outside. The Eskimo whom Duceane had addressed as Frozeo Ear had been talking with his brothers in their own language. He knew enough English to gain an inkling of what was under way, and seemed to realize that the natives should contribute something. "We sing for the blow-out," he volunteered after conference. "What will you sing?" asked Duceane, well pleased with the acceptance of his Christmas idea. Frozeo Ear began prompt illustration in a voice that was unquestionably musical: "Oni, tseunan whudugudwhuto yill; Oni, yuhun dutlish, oni nokkhan, Oni, dodutalokkhalho, Lud." "And what do you call that?" asked the judge. "There's no mistaking the tune, anyway," observed Morrison when the youth had shaken his head. It's a church hymn of some sort, and quite the proper caper for Christmas." Frozeo Ear's vocal contribution settled the matter so far as the court was concerned, and in a minute or two the pot held fifty dollars which the judge was to expend as he saw fit—"cats" barred, for the jail cook was to be separately subsidized. This last was necessary if they desired a real plum pudding, as eggs were two dollars a dozen, real butter the same price per pound, and other ingredients in proportion. Returning to the outer office, where as trusty, Duceane unfolded to Hecker Young the plan of the mock court for a jail Christmas. "And I suppose you'd like to go shopping?" asked the marshal, with a grin. With acquaintance, his feeling toward Duceane had undergone a change. Although he still considered him guilty of the attack upon Forster he no longer considered him a hardened, desperate criminal. He caught himself continually finding excuse for the slip, outrageous as it was, in the "North madness" that he had so often encountered professionally. "Why, no, marshal. I just wondered if you'd go to the trouble of getting a tree and enough gifts to go around. We've raised the money." The officer considered for a moment. "I'll take a chance with you, Duceane," he said finally. "It's against the rules, but I don't think anyone is going to put up a howl. Come along and do your own shopping. I'll have Reilly take the door." For his good work while a member of the posse, Reilly Masters had been made a deputy. The two went forth shortly into the drifted-in town. Except for the occasion of his appearance before the commissioner, this was Duceane's first moe outside the jail since he had been brought in a prisoner. Although the fall of snow had not been more than twelve feet, it was flourlike, and had piled itself up about the houses and tents until the very roofs were covered, and entrance was only possible through the tunnels. When they reached a point which looked out over Bering Sea, the prisoner paused and gazed toward the south over the miles of frozen hummocks. It was an hour after midday, and the sun had been over the horizon and was now setting directly in the south. By three o'clock the moon would rise in all its arctic splendor. Then the Northern Lights would appear, and the very portal of heaven would seem to stretch across the sky. But the prisoner was not thinking of nature's phenomena; rather his thoughts reverted, as they always did when he saw anything beautiful, to the golden woman who had come so suddenly into his life, and gone out of it again without a parting word. "Sart of impressive, isn't it?" remarked Young, gazing out over the sea of ice, which seemed to have solidified even as it had been tumbling about. "It sure takes a grip on 'None for six months in the year.'" "Has anything been heard of Yukona Grey, Young?" Duceane asked suddenly, turning away from the icy outlook as though it depressed him. "Are you never going to quit playing the game?" came the marshal's question in return. "No one is ever going to believe your yarn about the girl." They went on in silence until they had reached the main street, where some attempt had been made to dispose of the drifted snow and expose the store and saloon fronts. Although it was but two days before Christmas, there was nothing of the rush and bustle that attends that period in the cities and towns of the States. In Nome that had all centered around the first Christmas installment attendant on the departure of the last steamer. For those who remained there had been limitless time to prepare. As for marketing, the few women in camp had only to go out to their own storehouses, which had been filled before the winter had been into effect. Their pudding had been boiled, frozen, and hung up to await the feast day. Only within the saloons and hotels could have been found the crowds. For several days miners had been coming in from the creeks for a brief respite from the awful spaces and silences. But Young kept his prisoner to the street and the store of the trading company. About the vacant lot which had been turned into a Christmas-tree mart they found something of holiday activity, due to the fact that the loads of fragrant spruce had just been brought in. There had been a considerable rush, it seemed, but from the rather scraggly assortment left, Duceane selected a tree and asked the price. "Twenty-five dollars," said the fur-clad merchant. Duceane whistled his surprise. "Weepin' willows!" cried Young. "We don't expect you to hang it with presents, man?" "Take it or leave it," was the indifferent return. "I've been since the tenth of December getting that tree and a dozen like it. Mashed a hundred and seventy-five miles and back for them. If you don't like the price lay your presents on tundra moss. That won't cost you more than the seraping of some snow." Duceane counted out the money, and they started back to Federal headquarters with the tree between them. In addition, each carried a bundle of purchases from the store—tissue paper and tinsel for the tree, jews'-harps and candy for the grown-up natives, children, cigars and pipes for the whites, and trifling remembrances for the marshal's official family. "Your Christmas present came while you were out," was Masters' greeting to Duceane when he entered the jail office. "The district attorney has called that preliminary hearing you've been demanding for to-morrow." "The doctor must be willing to let Ned Forster use his eyes at last," said Duceane. "It'll be a sure-enough Christmas present for me if he can come to court." "Can't say as to Forster," observed the deputy, "but there's something up. He wants you before the commissioner at ten o'clock." When Duceane had gone in to report to his fellow unfortunates, Young turned to the new deputy with the remark: "Duceane's middle name must be consistency." "'Tis a jewel, I've heard," returned Masters, grinning. (Continued in next issue.) Telescopic spectacles have been invented for persons who are so extremely near-sighted that ordinary lenses do not offset the defect. Boats passing through the hydraulic lift lock at Peterboro, Canada, are lifted a total distance of sixty-five feet, in one and one-half minutes.
